PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 76th CONGRESS, THIRD SESSION

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1940

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 7, 1940)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we lift up our hearts to Thee, the hearts that Thou hast made and given unto us and for which we thank Thee now. Do Thou free them from the corruption of all vain emotions and make them perfect in purity and serenity, that they may be wholly Thine. As the duties of another day confront us, leave us not to be baffled by our evil and our weakness, but do Thou strive within us to our deliverance, that we may find our own true selves in humbly consenting unto Thee.

Animate us with the thought of our responsibility for the character and happiness of others; save us from the too-outward life in which no room is left for soul-nourishing silence, and also from that inwardness which unfits for action, for the due performance of homely tasks.

May we harken to the whispers of heavenly wisdom and open our minds to the breath of the overcoming God, so that knowledge of the Highest may pass into and beautify our lives, and may no worldliness of heart crowd in upon us to choke the avenues by which Thy spirit ever makes His entrance. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. BARKLEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Wednesday, February 7, 1940, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

RESOLUTION OF THE STAR OF LIBERTY SOCIETY, POLISH NATIONAL ALLIANCE

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a resolution addressed to the Congress, and adopted by 300 members of the Star of Liberty Society, Group 803, Polish National Alliance of the United States, of Stamford, Conn., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We, the 300 members of the Star of Liberty Society of Stamford, Conn., Group 803, of the Polish National Alliance of the United States, gathered at a meeting in Stamford, Conn., this 14th day of January 1940, unanimously adopt the following resolution, which our secretary is directed to submit to the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, in Congress assembled, with our fervent prayer that same be kindly accepted and considered:

"Whereas we Americans of Polish extraction recognize that Poland, the land of our forefathers, has been brutally and mercilessly attacked and divided by Germany and Russia, clandestinely working in unison with their ultimate goal being the destruction of the Polish nation and people;

"Whereas the mass murder and executions of men, women, and children, the arrest and imprisonment of Polish scholars and professors at the Jagiellonian University of Kraków as well as at other Polish institutions of learning and culture, as well as the commandeering and requisitioning of all the requisites of life such as food, shelter, and clothing, the interference with Red Cross and other relief organizations, the deportation of large numbers of Poles to Siberia, further substantiate our belief that the ultimate goal of the barbaric invaders is the destruction of Poland;

"Whereas in furtherance of their aims, as outlined above, the German Government is expropriating and evicting the Poles from their lands and settling thereon Germans brought from all corners of Europe and especially from the Baltic States and the Balkans:

"Therefore we, as Americans of Polish descent, having behind us a heritage of a people who for centuries were the bulwark of Christianity, civilization, and democracy, appeal to your honorable body and to our fellow Americans to take cognizance of the unhappy fate of the Polish people during this the darkest period in its history of the cruelty perpetrated upon the Polish nation, a country whose ideas of liberty, democracy, and freedom of opportunity were and are so much in common with those of these United States of America.

"Therefore we protest against the occupation and temporary partition of Poland by the two dictatorial powers of Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia who have neither legal right nor pretext to the military and political occupation of a land whose people through the centuries have shown their ability to maintain a democratic form of government.

"Therefore we appeal to all men of good will and understanding to stop the attempted extermination of innocent people whose only guilt was their desire to preserve their identity, culture, and freedom as well as their pledge to respect and honor their treaty obligations; be it also

"Resolved, That we express our deepest gratitude and thanks to the Government of the United States of America for granting recognition to the present Polish Government, located in France, thus proving to the world that it does not approve of the partition of Poland by the invading powers. In conclusion be it Resolved, That we all, present here, swear and affirm our wholehearted loyalty and allegiance to the United States of America and as loyal citizens hope that this resolution be accepted in the same spirit of sympathy and justice in which it was drawn."

POLITICAL CONDITIONS IN PENNSYLVANIA—PERSONAL STATEMENT

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania advised the Chair that he desired to be recognized to make a personal statement. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DAVIS proceeded to address the Senate in reply to a speech delivered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] on February 1 instant, and was interrupted by——

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. The junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] is not in the Chamber at the present time. We have sent for him. I think that it would be courteous of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania if he would await the arrival of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania before he proceeds with his remarks.

Mr. DAVIS. I shall be glad to wait.

Mr. BROWN. I make that request at this time.

Mr. DAVIS. Word had been sent to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania that I was about to make this address. I do not want to wait here all day, for I expect to have to absent myself from the Chamber later in the afternoon, and I will not be here tomorrow.

Mr. BROWN. I simply make that request of the Senator. Of course it is up to him whether he complies with it or not.

Mr. DAVIS. I will defer my remarks for the present.

Mr. DAVIS subsequently said: Mr. President, I should like to have the remarks I am about to make take the place of those made when I discontinued speaking when my attention was called to the absence of my colleague from the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, recently my distinguished colleague [Mr. GUFFEY] stated on the floor of the Senate a principle with which I believe we all agree. I quote directly what he said:

> We in this Chamber are all patriotic Americans, sworn to uphold the Constitution according to our best understanding. We take that as a matter of course. But above and beyond this formal, definite commitment lies a very essential obligation to play fair in politics.

Essentially, Mr. President, that is to say, insofar as the Members of the Senate are concerned, we have an obligation to be fair with each other.

Fairness, Mr. President, is a characteristic of the American people. No Senator designs to take an unfair advantage of a colleague. However, it is inevitable that misunderstandings should occasionally develop and that observations not altogether founded on fact should be made. We are told that "to err is human." Our experience in this Chamber shows that Senators are uniformly willing to correct an error, once it has been discovered.

I am convinced, Mr. President, that my colleague did not intend to be unfair when he presented his recent observations on the political situation in Pennsylvania. He gave us the picture as he sees it. If there were errors, they resulted from a misunderstanding of the actual conditions.

My colleague said that the Republican Party in Pennsylvania is owned "body and soul" by Mr. M. L. Annenberg, the publisher of the Philadelphia Inquirer, which he described as "the Bible of Republicanism." As a Republican Senator, I believe I can lay some claim to a knowledge of the Republican Party in my State. For three times I have been elected to the Senate from Pennsylvania on the Republican ticket. This involved participation in six political campaigns, three primaries, and three general elections.

The Republican Party in Pennsylvania, Mr. President, is not owned by any one man or by any group of men. In my campaigns for Republican nomination I encountered the opposition of some so-called party leaders, or bosses, as they are sometimes termed. But on each occasion I was nominated by the votes of Republican electors, free-minded, unbossed men and women who refused to be swayed by any small clique. The situation I have described covers the history of Pennsylvania politics for the last 10 years insofar as the Republican Party is concerned. This in itself should be sufficient to refute the charge that any man or any group or any faction controls the Republican Party in my State.

My colleague stated that Mr. Annenberg, not content with "owning" the Republican Party, now is ambitious to control the Democratic Party, the party to which my colleague belongs. It is to be doubted, Mr. President, that my colleague expected to be taken seriously when he included this observation in his speech. I prefer to believe that he was momentarily seeking to run up a mental blind alley, or facetiously providing entertainment for the Senate with something light and airy, to help divert our thoughts from the serious problems of the day. If that was his purpose, I grant he has achieved a measure of success, for he must know, as every other Pennsylvanian knows, just what is troubling the Democratic Party in Pennsylvania.

It is true that the Philadelphia Inquirer carried an editorial criticizing my colleague. Because of this we are asked to believe that Mr. Annenberg, its publisher, is ambitious to control the Democratic Party. Is this a logical conclusion? I can recall numerous editorials in the Philadelphia Record, of Democratic persuasion, which handled me none too gently. But on that account it never occurred to me that I should accuse J. David Stern, publisher of the Record, of reaching out to control the Republican Party.

We should bear in mind, Mr. President, that my colleague is a candidate for renomination this year. He has opposition, but its fountainhead is not the Philadelphia Inquirer. Nor does it spring from any Republican source, so far as I know. In fact, many Republicans in our State believe that my colleague is the logical candidate of his party for renomination, in view of the fact that he has so faithfully identified himself with President Roosevelt. The opposition of which my colleague speaks does not emanate from the Republican Party or the Philadelphia Inquirer. In time of stress and excitement incident to political campaigns it is often difficult for men to retain their perspective. Especially is this true when a man is a candidate with such a vast State as Pennsylvania to cover for campaign purposes.

If we are to believe what we read in the papers, the Philadelphia Record included, certain distinguished Democrats in Pennsylvania are hostile to the candidacy of my colleague; and the Philadelphia Record cannot be accused of presenting a biased report on this question, for it has editorially declared my colleague to be entitled to Democratic renomination on the basis of the support he has so unreservedly given to the policies of President Roosevelt.

We are informed in these newspaper reports that Mr. David L. Lawrence, chairman of the Democratic State Committee, is one of the numerous Democrats currently opposing my colleague. We are told that in the camp hostile to his candidacy are such gentlemen as John B. Kelly, chairman of the Philadelphia Democratic City Committee; Arthur Colegrove, publisher of a Democratic newspaper, the Corry Evening Journal, and a member of the cabinet of former Democratic Governor, George H. Earle; and Walter A. Jones, chairman of the Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission. These are a few of the prominent Democrats in Pennsylvania vigorously opposing my colleague. My colleagues may have read in the papers that only last Saturday the Democratic State Committee, meeting in Harrisburg, strongly endorsed President Roosevelt and the New Deal but withheld approval of my colleague's candidacy, which I understand was agreeable to him.

These and other Pennsylvania Democrats are currently reported in the newspapers as opposed to the candidacy of my colleague. In view of the statement he has made concerning Mr. Annenberg's desire to gain control of the Democratic Party, I suggest that my colleague supplement his recent speech on the floor of the Senate, specifically naming any Democrats who may have been found in counsel with Mr. Annenberg for this purpose. If any facts along this line are available, the newspapers should be entitled to them. Certainly that would be front-page news.

I have mentioned these matters, not to emphasize that my colleague has opposition in the Democratic primary, but to correct any impression which may exist here with respect to this so-called Republican interference in Democratic affairs. We Republicans, Mr. President, have troubles enough of our own without mixing in the trials and tribulations of our Democratic brethren.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I should like to suggest that it might be well for my distinguished colleague to study more closely the Philadelphia Inquirer before concluding it is a partisan paper, although I am willing to concede there was a time when it was considered the bible of republicanism in Pennsylvania. Since Mr. Annenberg became its publisher it has borne on the front page of every issue this slogan, "An independent newspaper for all the people," and directly beneath the masthead on the editorial page will be found this admirable platform:

THE INQUIRER'S PLATFORM

To print the news accurately and fearlessly but never to be content with merely printing the news; to strive always to uphold the principles of our American democracy, to war relentlessly against alien "isms," to fight intolerance, to be the friend and defender of those who are persecuted and oppressed; to demand equal justice for employer and employed, to work for the advancement of industry in Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, to expose political hypocrisy and corruption; to be just, to be fair, and above all to be unswervingly independent; to fight and never to cease fighting to maintain the sanctity of personal liberty and the inviolability of human rights.

In the Inquirer, Mr. President, appear articles by guest columnists of both parties, reflecting all shades of public opinion. I can distinctly recall an interesting column by the lovable and capable Jim Farley, chairman of the Democratic National Committee. I can recall columns by former Governor Earle and by Democratic State Chairman David Lawrence. Also there was one by Jack Kelley, a very good column, which all thoughtful Republicans would do well to read. None of these was bound by any restrictions with respect to subject matter. They wrote what was on their minds, and the Inquirer printed it on the first page.

As I said in the beginning, my sole purpose in taking the floor today was to correct an erroneous impression of the political situation in Pennsylvania at this time. When calm is restored I believe my colleague will see conditions more clearly. Surely we Republicans have enough to keep us busy without trying to make ourselves responsible for the embroilments of our Democratic brethren. I thank the Senate for the opportunity to make these brief remarks, in order that I might have an opportunity to keep the record clear as I see it.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I wish to thank my colleague for making the speech he has delivered. I say to him now that I retract nothing, because he has not challenged a single fact I mentioned in my speech, and I hope my other colleagues will read what I had to say in my remarks on February 1.

I also wish to thank my colleague for affording me an opportunity to give the history of the Republican Party in Pennsylvania, to bring it up to date from the days of Simon Cameron. I shall give the history of the Republican Party during the days of the leadership of Simon Cameron, Matt Quay, Boies Penrose, and others, and there are some very interesting chapters in that period, which I will bring up to date.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GUFFEY. I do not yield. In conclusion, I wish to say that the Republican Party in Pennsylvania will have a great many more troubles in this campaign before it is over.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I should indeed be very grateful to my distinguished colleague if he would give us a history of politics in Pennsylvania, and I hope that at the same time he will include the part he played in it, with the names of the men he claims controlled it on the Republican side.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DAVIS. I yield.

Mr. SMATHERS. Do I understand that both Senators from Pennsylvania are going to make speeches on the subject matter of who controls the Republican Party in Pennsylvania without mentioning the name of Mr. Pew, of the Sun Oil Co.?

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator has much to do in thinking about who controls the politics in his own State, from what we read in the newspapers. I think if there is any reforming to be done, the Senator should go to his own party in New Jersey and begin by reforming there, and not come over into Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

THE GOVERNMENT GOLD-PURCHASE POLICY

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I wish to present for the RECORD two letters from the Secretary of the Treasury dealing with a subject that has been a matter of considerable controversy on the floor of the Senate—namely, the amount of Russian gold coming into the United States. The Secretary is answering an inquiry which I addressed to him under date of January 22. I ask that these two letters be printed at this point in the RECORD.

For the information of the Senate, I state that the Secretary reports a total direct importation of gold from Russia amounting to $30,600,000, from 1934 to 1939, with no direct imports in 1938 and 1939. But he also reports the importation of refined bullion bearing the Russian stamp, and Russian coin, amounting to $216,000,000 during this same period, and nearly $100,000,000 during the last 2 years.

He also notes that a ship carrying $5,000,000 worth of Russian gold has just arrived at San Francisco for the mint at San Francisco.

We are buying all this Russian gold, which, I understand, costs not more than $11 an ounce to mine, at $35 an ounce. It is all part of our general gold folly. In the case of Russian gold, directly and indirectly purchased, we have paid somebody a handsome profit of perhaps $165,000,000. We do not want the gold. We cannot use it. Every extra ounce is a liability rather than an asset. Yet, still we buy and buy and buy. In the case of Russia we subsidize a nation whose public policy about 99 percent of America condemns.

I ask that the two letters be printed in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, February 1, 1940.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of January 22, 1940, asking that you be advised how much Russian gold has been purchased under the Gold Reserve Act since 1933 and the amount of such gold that the Treasury is now buying from month to month.

In reply, you are advised that the United States net imports of gold from U. S. S. R., as reported by the Department of Commerce for the calendar years 1934 to 1939, were as follows:

(In thousands of dollars)

Total	30,696

Some of the gold imported into the United States from other countries has been in the form of gold bars bearing a Russian stamp. We do not know when nor how this particular gold was received by the foreign country shipping it to us. We do not have available here in Washington the detailed information as to the amount of gold bars bearing a Russian stamp acquired by this Government during the period 1934 to 1939, but the various mints and assay offices have been requested to compile such information as is available on this matter. As soon as these data are received I shall be glad to further communicate with you.

In this connection it may be of interest to note that since 1934 the United States has imported $4,916,000,000 of gold from the United Kingdom, and that the United Kingdom imported large amounts of Russian gold during the period 1934 to August 31, 1939, as indicated by the following statistics of the United Kingdom:

United Kingdom net imports of gold from U. S. S. R.

1937	199,965
1938	115,540
1939 (January-August)[1]	33,782
Total	350,218

[1] British gold statistics discontinued September 1939.

Very truly yours,

H. MORGENTHAU, Jr.,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, February, 8, 1940.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The additional information concerning Russian gold which I referred to in my letter to you of February 1, 1940, is now available.

The Bureau of the Mint reports the receipt of gold bars bearing a Russian stamp and Russian gold coin in the following amounts during the calendar years 1934 to 1939:

1934		$1,672	[1] $1,707
1936	$3,839,360		3,839,360
1937	110,674,690	35	110,674,725
1938	48,941,270	70	48,941,340
1939	52,979,338	6,045	52,985,383
Total			216,441,655

[1] Includes crude bullion in the amount of $35.

The mint reports, however, do not indicate the country from which this gold was actually shipped. As set forth in my letter to you of February 1, 1940, the Department of Commerce reported that only $31,000,000 of gold was imported directly from Russia during this period.

For your further information, the mint reports that approximately $5,000,000 of gold shipped directly from Russia (Vladivostock) has just arrived at San Francisco. This gold is being sold to the United States Mint at San Francisco.

Very truly yours,

H. MORGENTHAU, Jr.,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7922) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I am going to do something I have never done before, and that is to offer an amendment to the bill as presented by the committee. It relates to the New York Customhouse, and comes in on page 39, line 12.

The collector of customs in New York came all the way to Washington to present this matter. The hearings having been closed, he was not heard. The senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] felt aggrieved, and felt that he had been discourteously treated, since he had brought the collector down here. I then asked the collector to write me a letter stating the facts. This he has done; and I feel sure that had the committee been in possession of these facts it would have restored the $90,000 which the House eliminated.

From these facts it appears that this customhouse, erected for the Customs Department alone 33 years ago, has not had a stick of new furniture in that period of time. It also appears that, originally erected for the accommodation of the Customs Bureau with some 800 employees, it now houses nearly every Government agency in New York. It houses the Internal Revenue Bureau for the Second New York District, with 394 employees; the Bureau of Customs Statistics of the Department of Commerce, with 159 employees; the post office, station P, with 201 employees; the Coast Guard, with 23 employees; the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, with 11 employees; and, in short, 1,734 persons are now accommodated in the customhouse. They want to adopt a new filing system, the one they now have being 151 years old, and they want additional equipment.

Mr. President, I move that $90,000 be added to the appropriation as it came from the House.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Is the Senator proposing to add an amount to cover the filing system and the furniture, or merely the filing system?

Mr. GLASS. Both.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the only argument in favor of this amendment is the statement made by the chairman of the committee, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I think the Government would make progress if it would reduce the number of employees now housed in this building from more than 1,700 to a thousand. When employees upon employees are being piled up, of course they must have more room. I shall not vote for the amendment; but whatever the Senator from Virginia wants I cannot find it in my heart to oppose.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, when this matter was brought to the attention of the subcommittee, as the Senator from Virginia has stated, we did not have a hearing upon it. The matter was considered last May or June. I am satisfied that there is a good case for the filing system. That is described in the letter to which the chairman of the committee has referred. I am not satisfied as to the necessity for other equipment, but I do not know how much of the proposed amount would be necessary for the filing system.

So far as I am concerned, I hope the amendment will be adopted; and then, if we wish to look into it further, we can find out how much is necessary. According to the statement which was presented to the committee, the filing system is really essential.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What action did the committee take on the matter after the statement of the Senator?

Mr. GLASS. The committee did not take any action, because it had no facts before it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The committee did not approve this amendment, did it?

Mr. GLASS. The amendment was not offered in the committee. That is the reason I am offering it now.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I thought this was a committee amendment. It now seems to be an amendment offered by the senior Senator from Virginia. Am I correct in that understanding?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. GLASS. It is not a committee amendment. We have finished with the committee amendments.

Mr. McNARY. Yes; I thoroughly understand that. I am trying to ascertain the status of this proposal.

Mr. GLASS. I am stating it to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. I was advised by the Parliamentarian that this was a committee amendment, offered at the suggestion of the committee by the able chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Parliamentarian understood that the Senator from Virginia offered a committee amendment. The fact is, as now stated by the Senator from Virginia, that it is a personal amendment.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the amendment? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, there is a textual amendment which I wish to offer on page 76, at line 9.

It seems that in the provision for contributions from the Federal Government, to the support of veterans' homes, the act which was passed by the Congress at the last session provided for contributions in case the State homes gave some hospital or domiciliary care. In the bill as it comes from the House the words "hospital or" are omitted before the word "domiciliary." There seems to be some question as to whether or not the words are needed. The matter was called to my attention by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and also by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

I think it should be said that the amendment is not offered because of necessity but as a matter of certainty, so that there may be no doubt about it, so that the contribution to be made by the Federal Government to the State homes may follow the provisions of the act which was passed in the last session of the Seventy-sixth Congress.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. ADAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I wish to express my approval of the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should like to say that the amendment was offered on behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts, as well as on my own account.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the States which maintain these veterans' homes are most desirous of this legislation. While the construction of the language of the bill, as reported, and as construed by the Comptroller General apparently makes this amendment unnecessary, yet the adoption of the amendment will prevent any change in any opinion that may be rendered in the future.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], on page 76, line 9, is agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, in connection with the appropriation in the bill for the Maritime Commission I desire to state that the failure to provide the authorization requested by the Commission does not mean the abandonment of the merchant-marine program. The fact is that an investigation of the appropriation bill and of the act creating the Commission convinces one that today the Commission has authority to contract to the amount of $110,000,000. Because this is true I am of the opinion, which I know is also the opinion of the other members of the committee who looked into the matter, that there was no necessity for or justification for an additional contract authorization. Under the authority that now exists the Commission can proceed a little slower than they may have desired, but with sufficient speed to justify the continuance of the program.

I ask to include as part of my remarks an extract from the 1937 appropriation bill, and an opinion on the subject, together with a justification for the opinion as expressed.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Third Deficiency Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1937 gave the Maritime Commission authority, as follows:

"In addition to the contracts which may be entered into under funds available to the United States Maritime Commission for carrying out the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, the Commission is authorized to enter into contracts for further carrying out the provisions of such act in an amount not to exceed $115,000,000."

A similar authorization was contained in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1940, the amount being $230,000,000.

When the Third Deficiency Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1937 was enacted there were then "funds available to the United States Maritime Commission for carrying out the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936," in an amount of approximately, and not less than, $100,000,000.

The two acts, therefore, authorized the Commission to enter into ship-construction contracts amounting to $445,000,000.

The report of the House committee on the Independent Offices Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1941 contains the following statement:

"The committee have approved the contract authorization request included in the Budget in the sum of $150,000,000. The total contract authorization to and including the 1940 act provided $445,000,000, and the amount recommended in the bill will raise that total to $595,000,000."

The Maritime Commission has been previously authorized to enter into ship-construction contracts in amounts totaling $445,000,000. As the contracts which have been awarded by the Commission (and they provide for the construction of 141 ships) amount to $335,000,000, it is clear that the Commission is now authorized to enter into ship-construction contracts in amounts totaling $110,000,000 in addition to the contracts which it has previously let pursuant to statutory authority. In the light of this existing authority it is not necessary to authorize the Commission to enter into any contracts additional to those which it is now authorized to let.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, late yesterday afternoon I sent to the desk an amendment to strike from the bill $1,000,000 for preliminary work on the new dam in the Tennessee Valley at or near Lenoir City, Tenn., commonly known as the proposed Coulter Shoals Dam. The purpose of that amendment, which I now call up, is to reduce the expenditures of the Federal Government by that amount this year.

I should like to explain to the Senate that I am not attacking the Tennessee Valley Authority. I do not pretend to be an expert on the subject of the T. V. A. In offering this amendment I do not intend to become involved in any technical discussion of the merits or demerits of T. V. A., or, as a matter of fact, of the Coulter Shoals Dam specifically. I simply take the position that we cannot go on as we have been proceeding, spending huge sums, and committing the Federal Government to the expenditure of even greater sums in excess of the Government's income. We must economize at some time, and this is one item, as I see it, on which we can economize to some degree, at least, this year.

When this bill was debated in the House the statement was made that the only expenditure made thus far in connection with the Coulter Shoals Dam was $600,000 for exploratory work. The $1,000,000 dollars provided for in this item covers the cost of an access road and construction camp, and perhaps other preliminaries to actual construction of the dam itself. If we go that far we will have committed the Federal Government to proceeding at this time with a wholly new project which in the next 4 years will cost an estimated $28,000,000. At least, Mr. President, that is the figure which was discussed and developed in the House debate when this matter was considered by that body. Considering the ordinary relationship of such estimates to the actual cost, my judgment is—and it can be checked at a future date—that the amount will be actually in excess of that large figure. So, there is much more than $1,000,000 involved in this vote, although that is the sum which would be saved this year.

Mr. President, frankly I do not feel that I am in a position to say that this particular dam should never be built. I have no opinion as to that. As I have said, I am not an expert on T. V. A. I contend only that since we have to cut expenses somewhere, if we are to get out of the hole we are in, this is one of those instances in which it can be done.

It will be noted that I direct no comments against the several other dams mentioned in this paragraph of the bill. They have been begun. Construction is either under way or approaching completion. Obviously those moneys must be spent.

Work of that kind cannot be stopped halfway. But in that same paragraph a new dam is suggested. I do not know whether or not the elimination of that project for the time being would actually save a million dollars, but there again I have studied the debate on that subject in the House, and Members on that side of the Capitol feel that it would result in such a saving.

I shall not take up much of the Senate's time. I do not wish to read the full record, as it is available to all Senators, and many of them are familiar with it, anyway. I have studied the question faithfully, and it is because of that record that I offer the amendment and ask for its adoption.

I should like to read briefly from the observations of my good friend and colleague, Representative MCLEAN, of New Jersey, which appear on page 499 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under date of January 18, and I read from it only in part, as follows:

When I said a few years ago that the T. V. A. was going to cost $250,000,000, I was ridiculed and scoffed at. Today the report of the committee admits that the project has already cost upward of $310,000,000, and that the project, including navigation, flood control, and power, will finally cost $535,000,000.

I continue to quote from Representative MCLEAN's remarks:

That is the total estimated cost. It will cost fabulously more. I extend an invitation to any Member of the House who is at all interested to sit down with me to quietly and conscientiously study this proposition. I will show anyone who cares to give the time how, up to now, this project has cost the United States Government at least $750,000,000; and with all its correlated activities and things which are being undertaken, I venture to say that we would find that the cost up to the present time is approaching a billion dollars more nearly than the $535,000,000 which the T. V. A. officials are willing to admit.

Again, Mr. President, I will say that I do not know nor do I pretend to say whether that statement is justified. I said at the outset that I am not hostile to T. V. A. That is not my reason for attempting to do what is sought by my amendment.

I have great faith in my colleague in the other House to whom I have referred, for he and one other Representative from my State have made a very close study of this subject. I simply reiterate, Mr. President, that here is the beginning of another much larger expense than appears in this bill, and I express the hope that the Senate will feel that at least this additional undertaking can be postponed. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate only a moment or two.

The original act, which was passed in 1933, provided for a navigation depth averaging 9 feet between Knoxville and the Ohio River. All the dams either have been built or are in process of being built, except the one at Coulter Shoals. This is the last one, to give a 9-foot depth for navigation from Knoxville to the Ohio, and then down the Mississippi River.

This item has a Budget estimate. The House committee adopted it. The House itself adopted it. The Senate subcommittee reported it favorably, and the full committee reported it favorably; and I hope the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] will not be agreed to. This is the last dam in the project, and this is the only one that will be asked for. The explanation of the project is to be found in the hearings at page 1766:

> We are asking for $1,000,000 to start construction on the Coulter Shoals Dam and Reservoir. This amount is sufficient only to acquire the site, build the access road and construction camp, and install necessary construction plant; and, incidentally, the construction camp will be less expensive than elsewhere; in other words, all preparatory work which is necessary in order that actual construction of the dam proper can start at the beginning of the fiscal year 1942. Here again it is essential that the preliminary work be authorized now in order to preserve the orderly sequence of construction work and retain experienced construction personnel. If this relatively small amount is not authorized, not only would it make impossible the maintenance of our construction program in the year 1942, but it would also be necessary to lay off experienced personnel and employ others a year later with consequent loss of efficiency and continuity of work.
> We are finishing the Hiwassee Dam materially ahead of schedule. That was originally expected to be completed in the spring of 1941. We are now expecting to have the reservoir filled and start producing power either in July or August 1940. If we can make this construction organization immediately available for Coulter Shoals, we will be able to realize a great deal of efficiency out of the whole operation.
> We have been able during this last year to move a large part of the organization, formerly stationed at Chickamauga Dam, to Watts Bar Dam, immediately upstream, and this has resulted in very material economy and benefit to the job. If we are not able to move that Hiwassee crowd to Coulter Shoals, it means a loss of a lot of those people. Furthermore, we will also be ready to put the Coulter Shoals design into our drafting room; if we are not ready to do that, it means some more lay-offs.

Mr. President, in a word, the Congress has authorized the building of dams from Knoxville to the Ohio. This dam will complete that authorization. It will be the last one. Construction now will mean economy. Construction later will mean additional cost. If the Senator who offered the amendment had heard all the testimony, as the committee did, and had read the testimony before the House committee, I am sure he would have felt that the House acted properly in approving the item. I hope the Senate will take the same action.

I submit the question for a vote.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I appreciate every word the distinguished Senator from Tennessee has said. I wish to say that while of course I did not have the privilege, as a member of the committee, of hearing the discussions to which he refers, I have studied the record. I wish to say, in fairness to him, that I note from page 505 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the Speaker of the House—without repeating all he says—went on to develop exactly the same thesis as that developed by the distinguished Senator who has just spoken.

Mr. President, I realize perfectly well that there is a reason for this project. It was not something that did not have a basis for its undertaking. As I said at the outset, I am not attacking T. V. A., or opposing T. V. A., or going into the philosophy of the undertaking. I am merely trying, as I think we all are trying, each as he sees the matter, in his own way, to effect economies. Economies must be effected.

Mr. President, I am glad to have made this record in that connection. There is nothing invidious or discriminatory in my mind. There is nothing in my mind other than what I have said. On that basis I hope my amendment will prevail.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I should like to direct one or two questions to the distinguished Senator from Tennessee. I should like to know whether or not a bill is pending in relation to the Federal Government compensating the States in which T. V. A. is operating for tax money which those States apparently have lost because the Government has taken over large areas in the T. V. A. adventure.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in answer to the question, such a bill is pending in each House.

Mr. WILEY. How much is the Government being asked to pay in taxes each year?

Mr. McKELLAR. Nothing at all. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is the author of the bill in the Senate. As I recall, the bill in the House, on which hearings are to be held, provides, under the agreement of last year, that in the case of certain companies which were sold to the T. V. A. and are now under the control of the T. V. A., the tax fund which the old organizations paid in certain counties shall be so adjusted that the counties will not lose those taxes. That is the principal object of the bill. By the way, that payment is not to be taken from the Government at all but, as I understand, is to be taken from the 12½ percent which the companies have set aside for the purpose of tax adjustments and tax payments. In other words, the payments will come from the T. V. A. and from the fund which is allowed to be paid. It will really be paid by the users of electricity, because it will be paid out of the 12½-percent fund, which is in addition to the rate established by the T. V. A.

Mr. WILEY. If I correctly understand the explanation, it means that if the bill which the Senator has mentioned as having been introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] should become law, it would provide that the T. V. A. should pay the municipalities out of its revenue.

Mr. McKELLAR. The municipalities and counties.

Mr. WILEY. Yes; out of the revenue which the T. V. A. receives from the sale of power.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is substantially correct, as I understand. If I am mistaken, the Senator may correct me.

Mr. WILEY. There will be no added tax upon the Federal Government?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all.

Mr. WILEY. If this dam were constructed, there would be no added tax in the future upon the Federal Government?

Mr. McKELLAR. This dam would be constructed just as all the other dams were constructed. The bill of which the Senator speaks has no connection with the amendment which is now offered.

Mr. WILEY. I appreciate that; but if this dam is constructed, it means taking land out of the taxable areas in that locality and putting it into T. V. A. It means a loss of tax income to those municipalities and counties.

Mr. McKELLAR. A very small amount would be taken out at this particular dam; but, whatever it was, it would be adjusted out of the 12½ percent which is provided for in the adjustment of rates.

Mr. WILEY. I should like a definite answer to this question: If this dam is constructed, and land is taken out of the taxable area of the municipalities, will the Government be asked hereafter to pay more money to those municipalities?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Government will not be asked to do so; but under the adjustment the T. V. A. has made, the 12½ percent which is to be used for the purpose of paying taxes could be used for that purpose, but no more. The Government would not be responsible for it at all. It would come from the revenue from the sale of power.

Mr. WILEY. That was my first question.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is exactly the situation.

Mr. WILEY. Then, if this dam is constructed, and land is taken out of the taxable areas in the municipalities, there will be no future load on the National Government because of taking out the land?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not on the National Government. It will be taken out just exactly as it is in the case of the other dams.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator spoke of 12½ percent. Was that originally money set aside by the Government out of investment to pay the taxes?

Mr. McKELLAR. No. The 12½ percent was fixed as coming from the users of electricity, for the purpose of paying taxes.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I should like to say a word in behalf of the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]. I intend to offer an amendment cutting the general appropriation from $40,000,000 to $35,000,000, on the ground that we are reducing appropriations for every public-works project in the United States, so far as I can discover, except the T. V. A.

If this appropriation is made, the construction fund of the T. V. A. will be $5,000,000 larger than it is in the current year. This is a project dealing with a particular locality. We are cutting down on every other project, whether it be general or special. For instance, the Budget provides a decrease of $15,000,000 on public buildings outside the District of Columbia. It provides a cut of $25,000,000 in Federal aid to highways. It proposes a cut of $10,000,000 in secondary highways. It proposes a cut of $15,000,000 in the grade-crossing appropriation. It cuts $2,000,000 out of hospitalization of veterans.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. Surely.

Mr. McKELLAR. In regard to the amount of last year's appropriation, it was $39,003,000, as stated to me by the clerk of the committee. The Senator also knows that in the meantime a very large number of companies have been bought by the T. V. A., and necessarily their expenses were somewhat heavier this year. Under the circumstances, the increase of $700,000 is more of a reduction than an increase, because they have more to do.

Mr. TAFT. I am referring not to the total appropriation, which is considerably involved in the question of income, and so forth, but solely to the question of money to be used for the construction of public and permanent sections of the T. V. A.

If the Senator will read the report of the T. V. A., which is in the House hearings, appearing on page 1621, he will note that it is said:

> The amount requested for 1941, $36,669,000, is considerably in excess of both the estimate for 1940 and the actual expenditures in 1939.

And the totals on page 1622 of the hearings show that, whereas in 1939 there was actually spent $29,950,037—practically $30,000,000—and whereas the estimate for the current year ending the 1st of July, which is approaching, was $31,018,000, the estimate for the next fiscal year, although the bill now carries an appropriation of $40,000,000 for the construction of dams and other projects, is $36,669,000, or an increase of $5,600,000.

Take, for instance, the question of flood control. The Ohio River has many flood-control projects. Certainly they are more of an emergency character than the building of additional dams under the T. V. A. The flood-control appropriation is spread all over the United States, and, whereas last year we appropriated $133,000,000, the administration proposes to reduce that to $70,000,000 this year. In other words, it proposes to take out $63,000,000 of what Congress appropriated last year for general flood control and pour $5,000,000 additional into the T. V. A., which only benefits one section of the United States, and which could proceed without laying off men or in any way limiting its construction services if the appropriation for it were cut $5,000,000.

I submit, therefore, Mr. President, that any amendment cutting down this appropriation should be adopted. I do not know enough about the particular dam which is going to add $28,000,000 to the cost of the project before we get through with it to discuss it at this time; but I say we can move somewhat more slowly, and certainly there is no justification whatever for increasing the T. V. A. appropriation. When the pending amendment shall have been voted on, I intend to move to cut this appropriation from $40,000,000 to $35,000,000, which would give the T. V. A. every cent that they have this year and every cent that is necessary for an orderly procedure in the construction program of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything on this question, but it seems to me a few words ought to be said, and I am going to confine my remarks to this amendment. The question brought up by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], of course, is entirely foreign to it. I should be willing to discuss that question, but it has nothing whatever to do, as I see it, with this question.

Congress passed a general act in 1933 setting up the Tennessee Valley Authority and authorized and directed that organization to make the Tennessee River navigable from its mouth to Knoxville to a depth of 9 feet. This is the last dam on the Tennessee River proper contained in that program. Heretofore in other discussions it has always been referred to as the Coulter Shoals Dam. It is the appropriation for that dam which the Senator from New Jersey seeks to strike out. He would eliminate that dam entirely. If we should do that, in carrying forward the program, it would be impossible to make the Tennessee River navigable from its mouth to Knoxville to a depth of 9 feet.

This dam is a part of that program. The program, I think everyone will admit, has been an efficient one. Under it, it is proposed to make the Tennessee River navigable from its mouth to Knoxville, and also to protect the Tennessee Valley and the Mississippi Valley from damage by floods, and assist even in navigation there. This is part of that program.

Mr. President, Congress has provided the program; Congress has directed what shall be done; and the T. V. A. is carrying it out. The appropriation to carry out the part of the program for this year has already been cut to the bone. In the judgment of the engineers, more money will be required than is appropriated by this bill.

The T. V. A., in the first place, like all other patriotic organizations—and it is a representative of the Government just as we are—cut down its demands as low as it possibly could and at the same time keep this great organization together. It would cause great damage if this organization should be broken up and there should be postponed for a year what ought to be done this year, and the experts and employees involved should be discharged. I may say, incidentally, that T. V. A. is a large factor in the employment situation in this country.

This dam will complete the program so far as dams on the Tennessee River proper are concerned. It has been in the program all the time. Congress has known of it all the while. It has been discussed here and appropriated for. In the last appropriation bill there was an appropriation to make the preliminary surveys. As I recall—and I think the Senator from New Jersey gave the figures—$600,000 have already been spent on this dam. It has been finally located, and the borings have been made, I understand, in the exact location provided for. Now it is proposed to cut it off. That is not businesslike; I think it would be very poor business to cut off the appropriation when it has already been cut to the bone. The testimony before the committee shows that if we want to carry forward this program with economy and efficiency, it could not be cut another dollar without great injury to the program and to the entire undertaking. I think we would make a great mistake if we undertook to take such action now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 70, line 20, it is proposed to strike out $40,000,000 and insert in lieu thereof $35,000,000.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I have already stated the argument for this amendment, and, so far as I know, no answer has been made by any Senator. Appropriations for all other public-works construction have been cut, but the appropriation for this project is being increased by $5,000,000. I cannot find any testimony in the record to justify that increase. Yesterday the committee struggled for hours to obtain a saving of $1,000,000 in the appropriation for civil aviation. Here is an opportunity to save $5,000,000 without in any way impeding the progress of the work, without requiring them to cut down their construction crews, without in any way affecting the work, except that they would have $5,000,000 more to spend if the amendment should not be adopted. I think, if the statement shall be examined, it will be found that the statement itself, apparently, sustains every contention I have made. I cannot find anything to the contrary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to say merely a few words. The Senator from Ohio has said that the appropriation for every other project has been reduced. In the appropriation bills so far reported there has been no reduction in the amounts made available for projects which are under way and partly constructed.

Mr. TAFT. But how does the Senator account for the cutting of the flood-control appropriation from $130,000,000 to $70,000,000?

Mr. BARKLEY. That does not involve stopping work on projects that are already under way.

Mr. TAFT. My amendment would not involve stopping work on projects already under way. They could go ahead with the $35,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. It would involve a considerable curtailment of projects already under way.

Mr. TAFT. Can the Senator show any statement in the report from which any such conclusion can be drawn?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not going into any great detail about all the projects in the United States that may be affected by reduced general appropriations, but in the construction of these dams the Senator, I am sure, though he is not an engineer, recognizes the fact that in getting ready for what is called the peak construction, it is necessary to lay the foundations, to do much preliminary work. I imagine, of course, the Gilbertsville Dam, about which there is no controversy, as I understand, because it has been under construction now for 2 or 3 years, there was an appropriation or an allotment out of the appropriation for this year amounting, as I recall, to $11,700,000. So a good deal of the so-called increase to which the Senator refers is involved in speeding up the work at this particuar dam, which is the largest dam on the river, to an estimated cost of $15,000,000 for the next fiscal year. In order to take advantage of what has already been done, and arrive at a peak of construction within the next year or so, it is necessary to spend more money at that particular place than has been spent in any year up to this time. About 1,500 or 1,600 men are already employed at Gilbertsville, subject to momentary fluctuations on account of weather. The peak of employment at that dam will be about 2,400. Within the next year the peak will probably be reached, which accounts for a considerable part of the $5,000,000 to which the Senator referred.

Inasmuch as the work at that dam has been carried on to the point where this extra money will be needed to put on these extra men and carry on the momentum of construction, it certainly would be unbusinesslike and unscientific and uneconomical for us now to proceed simply on the dead level of what it has been possible to do up to this time by a reduction in the appropriation available for the next year.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, on the question of the Kentucky dam, this year $11,722,000 is to be spent. The request is that next year that amount shall be increased to $15,400,000. It is not a question of completing the dam in a hurry, because it is going to cost $61,000,000 more before we spend the whole $95,000,000, which, in my opinion, is being utterly wasted on the Gilbertsville Dam.

The principal increase, however, is not on the Gilbertsville Dam. It is on the Watts Bar Dam, where this year $5,500,000 will be spent, and next year it is proposed to spend $14,400,000, an increase of $9,000,000. Certainly that construction need not be speeded up to that extent. We are slowing down every other construction in the United States. We are slowing down every construction having to do with all the people; but every other State in the Union is being asked to stop its own construction and put up additional money to be sent down to Tennessee to speed up the work on the T. V. A. project, which is not going to be completed anyway for 10 years to come.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in any engineering proposition, especially if it is a large one taking several years to construct, we cannot say, "We will start in with 500 men, and we will keep 500 men at work all the time until we are through." It seems to me a man does not need to be an engineer to recognize the fact that there are times in the construction of a dam when it is necessary to speed up employment and to speed up the putting in of material. There are great cofferdams to be built. The great dam at Gilbertsville will be the greatest storage reservoir for floodwaters east of the Mississippi River when it is completed. It is a great undertaking. There are cofferdams of immense length. We do not want to construct a cofferdam, and pump the water out of it, and then have to slow down. Then we should speed up. That is the time when we have to employ more men and use more material, all the plans being worked out by scientific engineers.

The same thing is true at Watts Bar, a dam across the Tennessee River. When it comes to the time of doing the major part of the work, it is necessary to speed up the work. It requires more money, and it is economy to do it now rather than to run the risk of having it all destroyed in time of high water, or something of that kind. It means more employment for the unemployed.

It seems to me the question is a technical one. It is an engineering question. The engineers have figured it out; and the testimony of the engineers before the committee shows that if the appropriation is cut a dollar below what is already in the bill it will injure the entire program, and it may result in millions of dollars of loss by letting up at a time when we ought to increase our efforts.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator knows, of course, as we all do, that in every great engineering project there is a preliminary beginning and a gradual working-up by reason of a farsighted plan covering years.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. BARKLEY. And it is necessary to work up, beginning some time ahead, to what is called the peak of construction, which is an economical way to do the work.

Mr. NORRIS. That is correct; and then run down.

Mr. BARKLEY. And then run down, after the peak has been reached, as the undertaking begins to taper off toward the final conclusion.

It also ought to be stated that for the first time in the history of the Tennessee Valley appropriation the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations, the full House committee, the House itself, the subcommittee of the Senate Appropriations Committee, and the full Senate Appropriations Committee have all agreed on this as the minimum amount necessary to carry on this program. That is something which has not occurred at any other time during the whole history of the T. V. A.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the Senator is familiar with the fact that the vote in the Senate committee on cutting the amount from $40,000,000 to $20,000,000 was only about 8 to 5 in favor of maintaining the amount at $40,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. What difference does that make? I am only talking about what the committee did.

Mr. TAFT. I do not want the impression to be given that there was unanimous approval by the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not say it was unanimous. I said that was the action of the committee. We operate by majorities here. Congress passes legislation by majority vote, not by unanimous consent.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. TAFT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Frazier	McKellar	Smathers
Andrews	George	McNary	Smith

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I merely wish to state that this amendment is to reduce the T. V. A. appropriation from $40,000,000 to $35,000,000, and that I cannot see how the Senate can consistently vote to reduce payments to the farmers and vote to reduce the amount appropriated for every other public work in the United States and still vote this increased amount for the T. V. A. It seems to me the whole question of whether or not we are going to be an economy Congress depends largely on this vote; for how can we possibly vote to reduce the appropriation for any other purpose after voting to increase the appropriation for this particular public work for one section by $5,000,000 over what it is receiving this year?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT].

Mr. TAFT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BARKLEY (when Mr. CHANDLER's name was called). I announce that my colleague the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER] is unavoidably detained on account of illness. If he were present and voting, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. MINTON. The senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is unavoidably absent because of illness, and I am authorized to announce that if he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. McNARY (after having voted in the negative). I have voted, but I am advised that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], with whom I am paired, is necessarily absent, and not knowing how he would vote if present, I withdraw my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are absent from the Senate because of illness.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] is absent attending the funeral of the late Representative Dowell, of Iowa.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], the Senators from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS and Mr. SLATTERY], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE] are detained on important public business. I am advised that if present and voting, the Senator from Mississippi would vote "nay."

The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HERRING], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] are detained in committee meetings.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 57, as follows:

So Mr. TAFT's amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 34, line 18, it is proposed to strike out "$2,300,000" and to insert "$2,211,171."

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to strike out a certain amount under the appropriation for the Federal Trade Commission, which was included for the purpose of enabling them to investigate advertising. The gist of the purpose for the use of these funds may be found on page 195 of the hearings before the House committee on the independent offices appropriation bill, where the 1941 projects are set up. I quote:

> The place of advertising in distribution, especially national advertising, is a matter of great importance and general interest. Is it costing the consumer too much for the service it renders? Does it sometimes render the consumer a disservice? The proposed inquiry would seek to answer these and other similar questions.

The result of my amendment would, in effect, be to reduce the Commission's appropriation by $88,829. I believe that this matter is understood by most of the Members of this body.

In the hearings on the pending bill before the House committee spokesmen for the Federal Trade Commission stated that this amount was desired in order to make a study of the value of advertising, the services rendered by advertising, as I have quoted. It seemed to me that, without accomplishing some definite objective, we would simply be subjecting one of the country's leading industries to unnecessary harassment at this time and perhaps penalize one more industry in some way. The question of advertising honesty is not involved. That is something with which the Federal Trade Commission has been dealing for many years very effectively. On the broad subject of making studies, it strikes me we should have enough data on hand to last us for the remainder of our lives.

I believe as an economy move we should reduce this appropriation by $88,829. I feel that there is no urgent reason for including this amount. So far as I know, there is no great cry and no great need for the Federal Trade Commission delving into some new fields of the advertising business.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. A suggestion occurs to me, that a mere reduction in the amount would not accomplish what the Senator has in mind; that is, there would be no finger pointed in the bill to what the Senator has in mind if we merely reduce the lump sum and leave it to the Federal Trade Commission to spend the money over the entire field. If the Senator really wishes to reach that point, I suggest that he offer an amendment providing that no part of the appropriation be expended for the particular purpose at which he aims.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado is a good one, and I should like to modify my amendment in that regard, reducing the appropriation by the amount I have stated and adding the words "and no part of this appropriation shall be used for the investigation of new phases of national advertising."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MILLER in the chair). The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. BRIDGES. I think this is a very simple amendment. We should not step into this new field. The Federal Trade Commission now has all it can attend to, and it is doing an efficient and capable job. The honesty of advertising is not involved. It is a question of stepping into an entirely new field. I hope my amendment may be adopted, and I ask for the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I think most Senators are familiar with the situation. Some gentleman telephoned me at 10 o'clock one night last week to advise me that he wanted to present this matter to me, and that he had discussed it with some other members of the Senate. I do not recall his name. He was greatly exercised about the authority of the Federal Trade Commission to make investigations. As a result of the inquiry made at so late an hour which caused me to believe that some alarming situation existed, I discovered what it was all about. The Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission has advised me that it is their purpose to continue a study of the methods and cost of distribution and marketing. There is no investigation being made of advertising. There is no provision in this bill for it. There is no proposal merely to investigate advertising. An investigation is being conducted into the cost of marketing and distributing products. Inevitably in any such investigation there is also an investigation into the cost of transportation, of commissions, and of advertising when advertising in connection with the marketing of a given product is an appreciable item. The Commission stated that only as an incidental factor would there be an investigation of the cost of advertising.

The Commission has no desire to make an investigation of advertising. In the marketing and distribution of one product the cost of advertising may be but an infinitesimal item. In another it may be an important factor.

The question involved in the Senator's proposal is this: If an investigation is being conducted by the Federal Trade Commission as to the cost of marketing certain products, and if advertising should be an important factor, is the Congress to say, "You shall not investigate the marketing of any product if, in connection with its marketing, advertising is a factor." I do not think the Congress will do any such thing.

Mr. President, no reason exists for the fear of the gentleman who is employed to represent the particular association. Because of the fact that this gentleman seemed so exercised the Federal Trade Commission issued to the press a statement on the subject some days ago, which should have allayed his fears. I am confident it did allay the fears that any businessman may have had; and I do not believe that this gentleman can frighten businessmen into the belief that there is any investigation of advertising alone, or any intention to conduct such an investigation.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. Is there any suspicion in the Senator's mind that this gentleman, being so familiar with advertising, might have been advertising himself to his clients by taking this action?

Mr. BYRNES. I do not know him, but I knew that the situation was serious when as late as 10 o'clock in the evening he telephoned me, and confided to me that he had discussed the matter with several Members of the Senate, and advised them, and they were all vitally interested in it.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is aware that there are a number of gentlemen in Washington who represent different associations, and must impress upon their membership the fact that they are here on guard, and that something is likely to happen that will prove very dangerous if they are not told about it in time.

Mr. BYRNES. I testify to the alertness of this particular gentleman, but at the same time I must say that the Chairman of the Commission impressed me as not being affected by it, and did not feel that it was a matter of importance. He said the Commission had only the kindest feeling toward advertising; that they recognized the importance of advertising in the marketing of products—in the case of some products more than others—that they were not prompted by any desire to show that such advertising was wrong, but that Federal Trade Commission investigations are always factual. It is their purpose simply to present the facts.

Mr. President, for the life of me I cannot see what harm could be done to anybody by an investigation as to the cost of marketing and distributing products if it is shown what percentage is spent for the various factors entering into it, and nothing else is to be done by it.

Mr. BRIDGES. Does the Senator not believe that there are enough investigations already being conducted by the Federal Government in various legitimate fields of business, without at this time adding one more, in view of the condition of the country?

Mr. BYRNES. The Federal Trade Commission has existed for some years, and the character of its investigations has time and time again received the approval of the Congress. More than that, the manner in which they are conducted has received the approval of Congress. I must say that the opinion I have had as to the character of their investigations was confirmed as the result of my conversation with the Chairman of the Commission about this particular investigation.

The argument that is made against it by the gentleman representing this association is that he himself is having an investigation of advertising made by Harvard, Columbia, and some other universities, and therefore no governmental body should conduct such an investigation. I suggested to him over the telephone that, while I knew nothing about it, I could see many reasons why the Government might make an investigation of this subject and not rely solely upon the investigation made by Columbia, Princeton, or Harvard, or any other university.

The question here is whether we shall drop the investigation of the cost of marketing and distribution because the Commission may perchance investigate the cost of advertising.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why not prohibit the investigation of freight rates? That is an element, is it not, in the distribution of products?

Mr. BYRNES. It is a much larger element.

Mr. CONNALLY. And the expenses of getting the product to market.

Mr. BYRNES. The largest expense is that of transportation. The proposed amendment might well include the words "nor shall it be spent to investigate the cost of transportation, nor shall the Commission investigate the cost of the commissions of brokers." Rather we should get Columbia University to investigate those matters, and accept their figures; but then the relative expense of transportation or advertising in the cost of distribution would not be shown.

Mr. President, the Federal Trade Commission has no desire to injure the advertisers' association represented by this gentleman.

Mr. BRIDGES. I do not know the gentleman the Senator talks about. He apparently confined his efforts to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. He told me that he talked to a number of other Senators.

Mr. BRIDGES. But it seems to me no question of honesty in advertising is involved. There is no great demand for this investigation anywhere in the country. I do not yield to the Senator from South Carolina in my respect for the Federal Trade Commission. I believe it is one of the most impartial and one of the fairest of the commissions in Washington today. That, perhaps, is not much of a compliment, but nevertheless by comparison the Federal Trade Commission shows up very well. But it merely comes down to this, that there is no demand for such investigation. Honesty in advertising is not involved. It is just one more way to spend a little money and to pry into a situation about which no great question has been raised.

Mr. BYRNES. I may say that the purpose of the investigation is with respect to the increased percentage of distribution cost. Instances are given in the motor-vehicle industry. In 1914 the retail distribution of the Ford Motor Co. was operated on 15-percent margin, while in 1938 that margin was 24 percent, an increase of 60 percent. How that affected the unemployment problem should be considered, as also the effect of the Robinson-Patman Act. And there are about 10 different reasons for the investigation. Advertising is only one reason, and a very minor one, for the investigation being conducted by the Federal Trade Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the demand of the Senator from New Hampshire for the yeas and nays seconded?

Mr. BRIDGES. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Legislative Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Ellender	La Follette	Russell
Andrews	Frazier	Lee	Schwartz
Ashurst	George	Lodge	Schwellenbach
Austin	Gerry	Lucas	Sheppard

Mr. TYDINGS. My colleague the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE] today is at Washington College, Maryland, where an honor is being bestowed on him by that school. I wish this announcement to stand for the day on all roll calls.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES], as modified.

Mr. BRIDGES. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment, as modified, was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H. R. 7922) was read the third time and passed.

LOANS TO FINLAND

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3069, to provide for certain loans to the Republic of Finland, and for other purposes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I wish to submit an inquiry. Of course, I have no objection to the motion made. I am merely curious to know whether or not it is the intention of the Senator from Michigan to proceed to the consideration of the bill today or to wait until tomorrow.

Mr. BROWN. The majority leader [Mr. BARKLEY] and others desire that we shall not proceed to the consideration of the bill today, but that it be made the unfinished business for tomorrow's session.

Mr. McNARY. With that statement, I have no objection to the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3069) to provide for certain loans to the Republic of Finland by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency, with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 9 of the act approved January 31, 1935 (49 Stat. 4), as amended, is amended (1) by striking out "$100,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$200,000,000," and (2) by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans to any one borrower outstanding and authorized at any one time shall not exceed $30,000,000. Provided further, That the Export-Import Bank of Washington shall not make any loans in violation of international law as interpreted by the Department of State or for the purchase of any articles listed as arms, ammunition, or implements of war by the President of the United States in accordance with the Neutrality Act of 1939."

And from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with an amendment to the amendment reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, on page 2, line 14, after the word "following" and the colon, to strike out: "Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans to any one borrower outstanding and authorized at any one time shall not exceed $30,000,000" and insert "Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans outstanding at any one time that may be hereafter authorized to any one country shall not exceed $20,000,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 of the act approved January 31, 1935 (49 Stat. 4), as amended, is amended (1) by striking out "$100,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$200,000,000," and (2) by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans outstanding at any one time that may be hereafter authorized to any one country shall not exceed $20,000,000: Provided further, That the Export-Import Bank of Washington shall not make any loans in violation of international law as interpreted by the Department of State or for the purchase of any articles listed as arms, ammunition, or implements of war by the President of the United States in accordance with the Neutrality Act of 1939."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, it had been expected that we would proceed to consider this bill today, but the hearings have not been printed. I understand they will be available in the morning. A number of Senators have asked that the bill go over until tomorrow in order that the hearings may be available. I have no objection to that procedure.

Mr. DANAHER. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (S. 3069) to provide for certain loans to the Republic of Finland by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and ask that it lie on the table. The amendment is on page 2, line 17, after the word "further", to insert "that no loan shall be made to any foreign government and."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there lies on the table Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 37, which I wish to have placed before the Senate. I was about to make a motion to that effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator move that the concurrent resolution be laid before the Senate?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. I shall make an explanation.

Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 37 provides that it is the sense of the Congress—and I shall ask that that be amended so as to make it the sense of the Senate——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, we shall have to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3069, in order to take up the concurrent resolution. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President the resolution merely expresses the sense of the Senate that the Securities and Exchange Commission should provide for and expedite the registration of any Finnish bonds, application for which might be made by the Republic of Finland or by any group of American citizens representing the Republic of Finland, the bonds, securities, or other obligations to be sold in this country.

I may say that the Committee on Foreign Relations on yesterday unanimously expressed its approval of the substance of this resolution, and I do not believe the resolution will require any lengthy discussion. I should like to have it considered.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, is it the purpose and desire of the able Senator to have the resolution considered at this time?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. Or does he desire that the whole subject matter go over until tomorrow? What is the reason for wanting the resolution considered at this time in advance of the consideration of the bill?

Mr. HARRISON. There is no particular reason except that if there is going to be a movement to have an application for the registration of Finnish bonds or securities submitted to the Securities and Exchange Commission, it would seem to me that action on the resolution should be taken immediately. Of course, it is not necessary that the machinery of the legislative branch of the Government should be put behind any such transaction in order that the proceedings might be expedited; it can be done without that; but, in view of the fact that the other bill has been laid aside and will not come up until tomorrow, and as there is nothing else before the Senate, I should like to have action on the resolution this afternoon. If I thought there was any great opposition or if any Senator desired it to be postponed, I would not make the request but would acquiesce in a suggestion of postponement.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection if the Senator desires to present the resolution at this time, but, of course, it must be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I have no desire to object to a hearing of the resolution, but I want to make it plain that the resolution of itself does not deal with the subject matter with which the bill reported by the Foreign Relations Committee deals. There is no need of the resolution nor is there any power back of it except such power as may be incident to an expression of opinion by the Senate on this particular matter; and every citizen, of course, has a right to express his opinion. The bonds may be dealt with by the Securities and Exchange Commission without the adoption of this resolution just as soon as the Commission sees fit without the Senate of the United States expressing any opinion at all. I have no objection to expressing my opinion or letting the opinion of the Senate go on record, but I do not want, if it can be avoided, the bill reported by the Foreign Relations Committee to be heard today because——

Mr. McNARY. It has been agreed that that bill shall go over.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Pardon me; I was not aware of that fact, as I was out of the Chamber for a few moments. I interviewed the clerk of the committee as to the printing of the testimony, and he informed me he thinks he will get the proofs tomorrow. I said that would answer my purposes so far as I was concerned, that I would not need anything further than the proofs. So tomorrow we could proceed, if we desired to do so, with the bill itself.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from California that I have not involved this resolution with the bill which has been reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I understand that.

Mr. HARRISON. I have kept it separate and distinct; I have not offered it as a substitute, as the Senator appreciates; but I thought it would not require much discussion, if any, and we could go on record as expressing the sense of the Senate as being favorable to the substance of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I think the Senator agrees with me when I say that the resolution, if adopted, would have no force, no legality, and that it is not necessary.

Mr. HARRISON. I cannot agree with the Senator that it might not have some force. I do not know whether any material amount of Finnish bonds can be sold in this country; people have different ideas about that; but I do agree with the Senator—and I made that statement—that it is not necessary for the Senate or the Congress to take any action on this matter unless we believe that psychologically it might help the sale of the bonds if they should be put on the market.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Exactly. I quite agree with the Senator from Mississippi, and I am willing to take even a futile action that can lend itself in any fashion to the end that he seeks.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWN. Reserving the right to object, as the author of the bill which has been temporarily laid aside, I desire to say that I have no objection whatsoever to the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi nor to its adoption. I believe that it may do considerable good. I do not believe that it will supply the immediate need that we hope to supply by the passage of the bill, but the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi may help considerably by arousing more sentiment and raising some money that will be of great aid to the Finnish people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be glad to recognize any Senator who wants to be heard.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may submit a Senate resolution in lieu of the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi? The Chair hears none.

The resolution (S. Res. 234), submitted by Mr. HARRISON, was thereupon read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Securities and Exchange Commission should provide for and expedite the registration of any bonds, securities, or other obligations issued by the Republic of Finland or any of its political subdivisions, upon application made to such Commission for such purpose by the Republic of Finland, or by any representative committee of citizens of the United States hereafter organized and duly authorized to act on behalf of the Republic of Finland for the purpose of obtaining funds through the sale of such bonds, securities, or other obligations.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had not read the resolution until a moment or two ago. As I read it, it seems to me unwise for the Senate to take the action contemplated by the resolution. I do not want to be understood—I am afraid I might be—as lacking in sympathy for Finland, or with any action which might be taken to help her; but the adoption of the resolution would have no legal effect and would establish a precedent that might come home to plague us in the future. As modified by its author, the resolution now reads:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Securities and Exchange Commission should provide for and expedite the registration of any bonds, securities, or other obligations issued by the Republic of Finland or any of its political subdivisions, upon application made to such Commission for such purpose by the Republic of Finland, or by any representative committee of citizens of the United States hereafter organized and duly authorized to act on behalf of the Republic of Finland for the purpose of obtaining funds through the sale of such bonds, securities, or other obligations.

The resolution, if adopted, would not have the force or effect of law. That must be conceded by everyone. We would have to make it a joint resolution, which would have to be passed by both Houses and be signed by the President, in order to give it the effect of law. If we should do that, it would be law and would be a direct legal way to approach the question, it seems to me, pending before the Securities and Exchange Commission. As it is now, however, the resolution merely expresses to the Commission the sense of the Senate that it should do thus and so about this case. In other words, it strikes me that it is exactly the same as if we were to adopt a resolution saying that it is the sense of the Senate that the Supreme Court should decide the case of A against B in favor of B. I cannot see any difference. Of course, it would be a means of approaching and effecting a purpose. Its object must be, in reality, to accomplish the same thing that would be accomplished by changing the law. We are asking the Securities and Exchange Commission to take a certain action. We do not even claim that what we ask them to do is lawful for them to do. We are asking them to give a preferential right to certain obligations which we name. However desirable it may be to do that, it seems to me it would be entirely out of place for the Senate of the United States to ask a commission or a court to take such an attitude. Here is a semijudicial tribunal, and we are expressing our opinion of a certain question pending before it, and telling it that we think that it should act expeditiously and in a certain way. That is the reason it seems to me the resolution should not be adopted.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. As always, there is force in what the Senator says. Of course, the resolution does not have the force of law; it is not binding on anybody; but is it not intended to be an expression of a hope or a wish on the part of the Senate that in the consideration of any application by Finland or any of its subdivisions for the registration of a bond issue the application may be expedited?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and if we want to do that, then, let us pass a law requiring it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was going to ask the Senator if his objection would not be cured by a very slight amendment, in line 4, to change the resolution so as to read: "That it is the sense of the Senate that the Securities and Exchange Commission should provide for and expedite the consideration of applications for the registration of any bonds," and so forth?

By such an expression we would not by any technical language commit the Senate to ask the Commission to register these bonds.

I will say to the Senator from Mississippi, if the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, that in the law there are certain restrictions and regulations governing the registration of securities that are to be sold in this country. The language of the resolution might be construed to mean that we are asking the Commission to waive those restrictions and regulations, which I do not think we can do in this kind of a resolution. If it were to have the force of law, we probably ought not to do it without further consideration; but I do think it would be consistent to ask the Commission, if application should be made for the registration of any bonds of this kind, to expedite the consideration of the application for registration, so as to avoid delay. That, I think, is really what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska will yield to enable me to answer the question——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say that all in the world I wanted was an expression of the desire of the Senate, if and when application were made to the Securities and Exchange Commission by a group of citizens of this country representing Finland or by the Government of Finland, that the Commission should expedite the consideration of the matter. The Legislative Drafting Service of the Senate drafted the resolution. I have no objection in the world to adding the words "the consideration of the registration."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that might make the request a little milder; but it does not change the aspect of the whole thing in any degree, it seems to me. The principle is left just the same. We are out of place when we undertake to do this.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Carrying out the suggestion, on line 4, following the word "expedite", I move to insert "the consideration of application for."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has the right to modify the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. The resolution also says that it is the sense of the Senate that the Securities and Exchange Commission should provide for and expedite—as it is now modified—the consideration of application for the registration of any of these securities. I do not think that changes the thing so far as the principle involved is concerned, or so far as putting ourselves in a false light is concerned. It seems to me we are absolutely out of place if we undertake to give this kind of advice. We have no such prerogative. If we think this ought to be done, we ought to be courageous enough to pass a law on the subject and let it be enacted into a statute; and then the Securities and Exchange Commission will be bound by it.

How would a member of the Commission feel—how would you feel if you were a judge—if the Senate should say, "It is the sense of the Senate that you ought to decide the case now pending before you, or which soon will be pending before you, in favor of the plaintiff"?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the Senator think the resolution goes quite that far?

Mr. NORRIS. Probably not.

Mr. CONNALLY. It does not ask them to decide the matter in a certain way. It merely asks them to expedite it. Congress by law provides for preference in the courts.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's criticism of what I said is just. If we should say that it is the sense of the Senate that the Commission ought to expedite this case and reach a certain conclusion, then we would have a similar case. I thank the Senator for the correction; but that still leaves our proposed action, as I see it, away out of the Senate's domain.

I do not care to discuss the matter any further; but it seems to me it would be a tremendous mistake for the Senate to adopt a resolution of this kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, as modified.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I desire to express my complete concurrence with the views expressed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I was in attendance upon the meetings of the conference committee on the transportation bill, and was not in the Foreign Relations Committee when this resolution was ordered to be reported. The truth of the matter is that this resolution relates to a subject matter committed by law to the Securities and Exchange Commission. We have placed power in the hands of the Securities and Exchange Commission, and we have placed certain obligations upon that Commission. Now we are undertaking to say, by a resolution of the Senate, what we think the Securities and Exchange Commission ought to do in a particular case.

Personally, I am as much opposed to having the Senate of the United States gratuitously express its views and undertake to influence the action of a commission as I am opposed to persons expressing opinions not requested on matters concerning which they have no responsibility whatsoever.

Mr. HARRISON rose.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think we ought to have a roll call on the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. That will be entirely satisfactory to me. I hope there will be a roll call.

Mr. NORRIS. Would not the Senator be willing to let the matter go over until tomorrow?

Mr. HARRISON. I would.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not particularly concerned as to that; but, while I may have an incorrect idea of the importance of the resolution, I look upon this as a very important matter, having a bearing on the future of the Senate, and of the Government itself away beyond its apparent importance. I may be entirely wrong about that, but I should like to let Senators think about it overnight, and see whether we ought to pass this resolution. If it will not discommode the Senator from Mississippi in any way, I should be very glad to have that done.

Mr. HARRISON. It will not discommode me, but it would be very delightful to me if I may be permitted to remove an impression that the Senator's remarks perhaps have made on one or two Senators.

Mr. President, I see nothing dreadfully wrong in the United States Senate expressing the sense of its membership on some subject. It has been done many times since the Senate was first organized. I do not know why it should get any one heated at this time. We know that the newspapers of the country, and the people of the country have expressed themselves in articles, editorials, speeches, mass meetings, benefit performances, and letters; all imploring us to do something for Finland.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator says we have frequently done things of this kind. He may be entirely right and I may be wrong about the matter, but I do not remember a single instance in which we have done such a thing. That does not mean that we have not; but I wish the Senator would point out instances of the kind. We have frequently expressed our sense of something of which we had jurisdiction, as to which we were going to pass legislation, or something of the kind; but have we ever expressed in a resolution the sense of the Senate that any tribunal ought to do or not to do any particular thing?

Mr. HARRISON. I think we have many times expressed the sense of our membership on matters not entirely within the scope of legislative matters in our jurisdiction.

We are not asking a court to change its opinion or to render a decision along a certain line. What we are doing, in view of the evident feeling in the country and the appeals that have come to us from a great many of our people to try to render some assistance to Finland, is to take some action along that line. It may be perfectly fruitless. It may get nowhere. It may not result in any material assistance to Finland, but it is an effort in the right direction; and, in my opinion, it would be very helpful psychologically if a group of citizens representing Finland or the Republic of Finland itself should get behind the movement and put on a campaign which, of course, would have to be well organized, to sell bonds in this country. But I believe it can be done, and the results will be worth the effort.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. The effect of adopting this resolution would in no way be that the Securities and Exchange Commission would have to ignore the law or its own regulations in considering whether or not an application for registration of these bonds should be approved. The Commission might turn down the application, and if the application did not comply with the law or with their regulations they would be expected to turn it down; otherwise, to approve it. I understand that the Senator's object is that whatever action the Commission may take in regard to an application for registration should be taken with reasonable speed, so that if there is an opportunity to float any of these bonds in this country it will not be unreasonably delayed.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is absolutely right. I have asked for no change at all in the law. As I said, I do not know whether or not Finnish bonds can be sold to the American public. I believe that some persons, moved by patriotic impulses and their sympathetic interest in Finland, will buy the bonds. I hope they will buy a great many of the bonds. I voted against the bill, which is coming up tomorrow, to increase the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank by $100,000,000, and to turn over to other countries, upon proper showing, loans from a Government agency. I do not believe this is a good time for the Federal Government to use its funds in that way, especially when we are reducing many appropriations. In addition, I believe that it would be a serious mistake to establish such a precedent. I did believe, however, it would not be in violation of the spirit or the letter of the Neutrality Act for us to say in simple language that it is the sense of the Senate that the Securities and Exchange Commission, in the performance of its duty, should give expeditious consideration to an application by Finland for the sale of bonds, if and when an application should be made.

This resolution does not provide that they have to announce that the bonds are good; it has nothing in it about the character of any application to be made to the S. E. C.; as I have stated before, of course, the resolution is not legally binding. Its importance lies in its psychological effectiveness. The resolution does not provide that American citizens have to buy these bonds or securities. If Finland's bonds or securities appeal to the impulses of certain American citizens, they can purchase them.

It seems to me this is a good idea, and that it is a step in the right direction. I hope that if the Republic of Finland does make application, or authorizes a group of our citizens to act for it, many millions of bonds will be sold. I may say, also, that the Finnish bonds are down to about 45 at present as has been stated before our committee. I can appreciate that one who buys one of the bonds, if there is an issue of bonds, is not going to buy it as a business investment, but he may buy it on account of his sympathetic feeling for the Republic of Finland and the heroic fight her people are making.

Mr. President, it seems to me that at least we should go far enough to adopt this resolution, to show that we are sympathetic to Finland, and that it is the sense of the Senate that the Securities and Exchange Commission to which, before the bonds can be sold, application must be presented and the facts with reference to the bonds or securities shown, should expedite consideration. I hope we can go that far, and I believe the resolution should be adopted.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. I wonder whether I might ask the Senator if he would consider a possible alteration of the language of his resolution, by striking from line 3 the words 'provide for and," and inserting after the word "expedite" the words "consideration of possible," so that the resolution would read:

> That it is the sense of the Senate that the Securities and Exchange Commission should expedite consideration of possible registration of any bonds, etc.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that that has already been agreed to, as to the consideration, and I was about to ask about the words "provide for and" be stricken from the resolution.

Mr. DANAHER. That had not come to my notice, and I thank the Senator from Mississippi for his courtesy.

Mr. HARRISON. That was agreed to on the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. DANAHER. I also ask the Senator whether he has checked up at all on the amount of outstanding Finnish bonds now in this country?

Mr. HARRISON. I have not. I may say that the Committee on Foreign Relations did not have under consideration this resolution; it was not referred to that committee; it has been on the table. We had before us the Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, and he stated that they already had most of the data needed, because an application was made some time back, but that the data would be brought up to date if new application were made. He did not think it would take longer than the 20 days required by law and thought that in that time they could be getting up the data.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think Mr. Jones testified before the Committee on Foreign Relations that heretofore Finland had borrowed in the United States about $100,000,000, about eight or nine million of which represented a loan by the Federal Government.

Mr. CONNALLY. He said during the World War.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; and that all of that had been repaid except about $8,000,000, out of an original loan of about $100,000,000.

Mr. KING. And the balance is not yet due.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky is almost accurate, but not quite. The amount of the bonds privately floated by Finland in the United States was $99,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. I had reference to all the borrowing.

Mr. BROWN. The amount acquired from the Government of the United States was $9,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not mean to create the impression that they had borrowed from the Government approximately $100,000,000, but that all the indebtedness of Finland and the Finnish people in the United States since the World War amounted to approximately $100,000,000.

Mr. BROWN. One hundred and ten million dollars.

Mr. BARKLEY. One hundred and ten million dollars; but that practically all of it had been repaid—all except about $8,000,000.

Mr. BROWN. There is $8,000,000 of indebtedness to the Government of the United States and $10,000,000 is still outstanding and unpaid, not yet due, in the hands of the general public, of which amount, I understand, about $8,000,000 is held in the United States and about $2,000,000 outside.

Mr. BARKLEY. In other words, of the $110,000,000 they have borrowed, both from the Government and privately, since the World War, they have paid all back except about $18,000,000 or $19,000,000.

Mr. BROWN. That is correct.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me point out that when the Senator from Kentucky speaks of Finland borrowing that money, he refers to Finnish corporations, who incurred what he describes as private debts. The debts of the Republic of Finland as such have never amounted to $100,000,000 in this country and there have never been any such repayments in terms of Republic of Finland payments. What Mr. Jones referred to when he spoke of public and private debts were the public debts of the Republic of Finland on the one hand and the private debts of Finnish corporations on the other hand.

To illustrate, and so that there may be no question, and since I had very deep sympathy with the purposes of the Senator from Mississippi when I first heard of his intention in this particular, I took the matter up with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and I hold in my hand a schedule, or chart, of such issues as were publicly sold down to date, to the last detail, including the current market price of each of the issues now outstanding in this country. This information was furnished to me this morning, and I should be very happy in due course to submit it for the consideration of the Senate in order that we might all be informed on the facts.

The point I wanted to make perfectly clear was that the reference by the Senator from Kentucky to Finland's borrowings and Finland's repayments includes not only her public, but also the private debts of her private corporations in this country.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Mississippi will yield, I sought to create no other impression, and if my language did create another impression, I am sorry. I referred to the total borrowings of the Finnish Government and the Finnish people in the United States. So far as I know, the only loan of the Finnish Government as such was a loan made by the Federal Government of $8,000,000 or $9,000,000. They may have floated some other Finnish Government bonds, but I do not recall any. At any rate, the total public and private debts amounted to a sum in the neighborhood of $110,000,000, I understand. All of that has been repaid except about $18,000,000 or $19,000,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am sure the Senator from Connecticut does not intend an inference to be drawn from the observations which he has submitted to the effect that because some corporations in Finland have obtained money by the issue of bonds that would be an objection to our rendering her any aid, either through the instrumentality of the pending resolution or otherwise. I think it is to the credit of the Finnish people that after the great World War, after the Finns had been subjected, as the Senator knows, to oppressive conduct for many years, they organized their Government, almost out of nothing, so to speak. As the Senator knows, they were a population engaged largely in agriculture. More than 50 percent of the land, except that which is owned by the state, is owned by individuals. A number of enterprising and patriotic Finns went to work to rehabilitate their country, to develop it. They borrowed money and started some enterprises. Until just before the onset of the last war they presented a very fine picture of development agriculturally and in a business way. A number of corporations had improved the facilities of transportation. They built factories, and they have given employment to a large number of people. They were in a prosperous condition and would have continued to be prosperous, except for this unfortunate war, which has brought upon them great suffering and has certainly impaired their credit.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, the Senator uses the term "unfortunate war." Does the Senator understand that a state of war exists in Finland?

Mr. KING. Not under the law which we enacted, but the Bolsheviks are raining bombs upon them, they are destroying hospitals, and killing men, women, and children. But there is not a state of war there any more than there is between Japan and China.

Mr. DANAHER. I do not wish to trespass on the time of the Senator from Mississippi, but I should like to be heard in due course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I do not desire to have the impression left that the bulk of the indebtedness owed by Finland in the United States is private debt. Sixty million dollars of the one hundred million dollars about which we have been talking, incurred in the post-war period, was strictly the indebtedness of the Finnish Government, the obligation of the Finnish Government. The balance is made up of indebtedness of the city of Helsinki, of a general municipal loan by the Government for the benefit of municipalities in Finland, and of the Industrial Mortgage Bank and Residential Mortgage Bank, both Finnish governmental institutions. The $100,000,000 we are talking about is in the very true sense of the word a governmental loan and not a private loan.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, in the Foreign Relations Committee the other day when the committee was in executive session the membership very graciously gave me permission to speak a few minutes in connection with a proposed amendment to the pending bill, authorizing the doubling of the capital of the Export-Import Bank, to restrict loans so that they could not be made to any foreign government as such. I had offered that amendment previously in the Committee on Banking and Currency, and it had failed. So far as I know, in view of the way the bill apparently has come from the Foreign Relations Committee, it failed there, if in fact any Senator offered it in my behalf.

In any event, it does bear, it seems to me, on the question posed by the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi as to whether or not a loan in behalf of the Republic of Finland as such should be considered by the United States under the circumstances overseas at the present time.

Regardless of what the condition was in December, at which time the Finnish Minister made representations to our Department of State in connection with the status of his country and of Russia, 2 months have elapsed, and not only do we find that a state of war actually exists, but the newspapers this morning report, through the Associated Press, that the French Republic is taking and is demanding that there be taken complete steps for the assistance of the Republic of Finland. Great Britain, through its representatives in this city as well as overseas, and in the Parliament, has already taken steps in behalf of the Republic of Finland. There is being associated with the Republic of Finland, in other words, a status of war in which the Empire of Great Britain and the Republic of France are so far committed to the success of one side that once again the United States will be in the position of taking an unneutral step if we leap into this picture in continuation of an American loan to the Republic of Finland as such.

Whatever has been done through the Export-Import Bank up to now with respect to the Finnish-American Trading Corporation, a New York corporation, it has not been done by the United States of America, but has been done by the Export-Import Bank, a corporation chartered under the laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, we are now considering whether it is the sense of the Senate that an application for a loan in behalf of the Republic of Finland, as a nation, shall be approved, whereas if we in America really want to help the credit of Finland we can go in the market and buy her bonds today.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. How would it help Finland for the American investors to go into the market and buy existing outstanding Finnish bonds, upon which Finland, or some subdivision of Finland, has already obtained the money?

Mr. DANAHER. Like Great Britain and France, Finland can use the holdings of her nationals in this country to build up and maintain her bond market. Finland can borrow against that collateral, and if the market is built up and maintained, inevitably the value of the collateral would increase.

Mr. BARKLEY. The value of the outstanding bonds in the hands of the investors is fixed. The owner of the bonds would not get that money. The only way Finland can benefit by the purchase of bonds by private investors in the United States is to issue more bonds, the proceeds of which would go directly to the Republic of Finland. As I understand, that is all the resolution contemplates.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, let us see if that is so. In October 1923 there were floated in this country Republic of Finland external loan sinking-fund gold 6-percent bonds, redeemable in 1940, to the value of $10,000,000. That is the total face value. The face value of each bond was $1,000. On February 7, 1940, the quotation on that bond was 43½. Mr. President, 43½, and the face value was $1,000. At the end of 1939 it was 40.

The last amount called on that loan was $294,000, and the Government of Finland paid $1,000 a bond for them when it called them in, on September 1, 1939, in order to build up and maintain a market for those bonds.

The Finland Residential Mortgage Co. issued first-mortgage bonds which originally were not guaranteed by the Republic of Finland. They were issued at 6 percent, redeemable September 1, 1961. That issue came out in September 1928. They were not guaranteed by the Republic of Finland until 1934, and then they were guaranteed in order to maintain and keep a market for them. Of that $10,000,000 of bonds issued at that time there are at the present time $4,011,500 outstanding. Each bond with a face value of $1,000 could be bought yesterday at 19.

The city of Helsingfors issued an external loan sinking fund 6½ percent issue of bonds, which is not guaranteed by the Republic of Finland. It is redeemable in 1960. The loan was for $8,000,000, issued in March 1930. The present outstanding amount against it is $7,005,000. Yesterday, February 7, 1940, the price for that bond was 25¾.

Mr. President, if the United States Senate is to be asked to place its approbation upon loans in behalf of the Republic of Finland, and give apparent strength and apparent approval to a new issue to be floated in this country, and take American taxpayers' money on the representation that we in the Senate approve that sort of thing, it seems to me that the Senate is going definitely askew in the light of the facts, and I cannot believe that the Senate in its collective wisdom will say that it is the sense of the Senate that under the circumstances the S. E. C. shall expedite consideration of an application for issuance of Republic of Finland bonds.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. I have not studied the resolution which was introduced and which is being considered at this time. When it was brought to the floor today I think it was made very clear that it was unnecessary to adopt the resolution, as the bonds of Finland could be sold in the United States without the resolution being adopted. The Senator from Mississippi very definitely stated that he desired to have the resolution adopted, as I understood, perhaps for some psychological effect that it might have.

I have listened to the discussion by the Senators who have raised the question of the right of the Senate to express an opinion to a department or agency of government. I appreciate the thought behind those objections. As I have sat here and listened, and especially during the last argument that was made about the price of Finland's bonds, I have been thinking of the condition and need of Finland as it is at this moment—a free country, an independent nation, fighting against the aggressor that would destroy the right of that country to govern itself.

The Senator from Connecticut propounded the inquiry as to whether the wisdom of the Senate would recommend investment in Finland's bonds. I do not know anything about the collective wisdom of the Senate, but my own feeling is that I should like very much to express my opinion in favor of an investment of this nature if the entire investment should ultimately be lost. I should be glad to invest, Mr. President, in any country that fights for freedom.

I wonder what the psychological effect might be if the Senate of the United States should vote down the resolution today.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word. I am somewhat amazed at the attitude of my friend, the Senator from Connecticut when he suggests that if American people want to help Finland they ought to go out and buy existing bonds at 43 cents on the dollar. Of course, if I were an investor and wanted to make money on an investment, and had sufficient confidence in the ultimate success of Finland to buy the bonds that are outstanding, it probably might be a good investment, and if Finland is able to sustain her nationality I think it would be, because I have no doubt that ultimately Finland would pay those bonds dollar for dollar, and it would be a good investment to pay 43 cents on the dollar for the outstanding bonds. But not a penny of that money would ever reach the treasury of Finland. Not a dollar of it would buy a suit of clothes, or an automobile, or a wagon, or a barrel of flour, or a rifle, or a machine gun, or an ambulance.

I realize that it may be a little unusual for the sense of the Senate to be asked on a proposal of this sort—though I agree with the Senator from Mississippi that the Senate has, on former occasions, expressed its sense about various matters. We all recognize that it does not have the force of law. We all realize that it may not influence the agency to which reference is made in the resolution; but it certainly is an expression of the feeling of the Senate, and I believe the overwhelming feeling of the American people, that if we can do something that will be of financial, moral, or psychological assistance to Finland without having to involve ourselves in a war or in participation in that war, it ought to be done.

Mr. Frank, the Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, testified before the Foreign Relations Committee that ordinarily a minimum of 45 days is required; that usually it is 20 days after the application is filed before any possible action can be taken, and that probably 25 days more would be required. Even if the Commission should pass upon the application in the shortest possible time, on the very day the time expires, it might require 45 days for the bonds to be put on the market if they were approved.

The resolution of the Senator from Mississippi does not ask the Securities and Exchange Commission to waive any of its regulations. It does not ask it to hurry its procedure in an unseemly way; but it does express the sense of the Senate that, in conformity with law and in conformity with its own regulations, consideration of such application should be expedited as much as is reasonable.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have been listening with much interest to this entire discussion, and I confess that I am somewhat at a loss to know what constructive objective is intended to be served by the resolution, and whether its effect is entirely clear. As I understand what has been said down to this moment, it amounts to a declaration that the passage of the resolution will not provide any aid of any kind to Finland. Is that correct?

Mr. BARKLEY. It will provide no direct financial aid. It does not raise any money.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Is there any suggestion to the Senate or to any of its committees that the Republic of Finland is expected to make application for the registration of such a loan?

Mr. BARKLEY. The resolution does not suggest that Finland is expected to do so; and I am unable to say that it will. However, in the past Finland has probably floated bonds in this country and it might wish to do so again. If the Securities and Exchange Commission should approve an application of that sort with all necessary speed, and at the same time without undue haste, an opportunity might be afforded for some Americans to invest their own money in the bonds.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, is it the purpose of the Senate to express its sympathy for Finland, a sympathy which I take it is almost universally felt? Or is it the purpose of the Senate to provide aid for Finland? If it is the purpose to do either of these things, is either of them actually served by the resolution?

Mr. BARKLEY. I should say the purpose is a combination of both. I think the passage of the resolution would automatically be interpreted as an expression of sympathy on the part of the Senate for Finland, and it might bring about expeditious consideration of a means by which Finland might be given financial aid.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. But there is no suggestion that the Republic of Finland is expected to make application for such registration.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think the Senator would feel that it would be proper legislation for the resolution to invite Finland to do so.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am trying to clear up my own mind as to what the resolution will do, and what hope would be held out to the Republic of Finland if the resolution were passed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Hope would be held out that if Finland sought to float bonds and sell them to private investors in the United States, the application to float them and their possible sale would not be postponed until it might be too late for the realization of the funds to be of any value.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, it has been impressed upon my mind since the beginning of this discussion about aid to Finland that what Finland and the people of Finland need is military aid. Finland does not need loans for agricultural purposes. Finland does not need, even in this hour of its distress, any great amount of medical assistance. I gather from the newspapers that that is being provided.

Mr. BARKLEY. While at this moment I think it may be true that Finland does not need agricultural products, my information is that within possibly 2 or 3 months, on account of the fact that her men have been drawn into the army and thereby her agricultural products will be curtailed, there will be great need for food products in Finland. Of course, the injury of the men of Finland in the battles which are now raging presupposes the necessity for greater medical supplies. Mr. Jesse Jones yesterday submitted to the Foreign Relations Committee a list of the nonmilitary things for which Finland is now negotiating in this country. While I agree with the Senator that Finland's most emergent need is probably for military equipment—airplanes, machine guns, tanks, and things of that kind—I think the Senator will concede that it would be difficult to obtain enactment of a law by the Congress providing loans for the purchase of such things. There is a terrific list of things which she can buy with any credit she obtains in this country, whether from an agency of the Government or from private sources. There is a terrific list of things which she needs and can buy and which do not come within the category of military supplies.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. There can be no doubt about that. I agree with what the Senator has said; and I take it that provision for such things is being made by the bill which has been reported from the Banking and Currency Committee and the Committee on Foreign Relations, but we are not now considering that bill. That bill provides only for a loan through the Export-Import Bank for nonmilitary purposes.

I am merely pointing out that the emergent need of Finland, as the Senator himself has so well said, is not for such aid, but for military equipment and supplies. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is merely an expression of opinion by the Senate that an application which may or may not be made—we do not know—to the Securities and Exchange Commission for the registration of a bond issue, the proceeds of which may be used for any purpose, including military purposes, should be expedited.

The question which arises in my mind is whether or not it is clear to the country, to Finnish sympathizers, and to Finland that the passage of the resolution is actually only an empty gesture. It is merely a declaration, in a roundabout way, of our sympathy for Finland, and does not of itself add in any way to the ability of the Finnish Republic to obtain the needed funds. I ask the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] whether or not I am correct in that statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. In regard to that matter, I should say that the Senator realizes that, notwithstanding the restrictions contained in the bill which is the unfinished business, and which has been temporarily laid aside, with reference to the articles which can be bought with the money that is to be loaned, any money that may be obtained by Finland from the sale of bonds privately in the United States may be used for any purpose, so long as there is not a declared state of war, and so long as neither the President nor Congress has taken action to bring the neutrality law into effect. So, if any bonds are to be sold or any money raised under a program which will have to go through the sifter of the Securities and Exchange Commission, that money may be used exclusively for military supplies if Finland sees fit to use it for that purpose, so long as there is no state of war and no proclamation.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN. The three principal things which Finland needs, as shown by what she buys from us, are cotton, oil, and wheat. They are the three heaviest exports from the United States to Finland; and, of course, every one of those things can be purchased under the provisions of the bill which we hope to pass tomorrow or Monday.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator, not being a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, was not aware of the fact that on yesterday Mr. Jones submitted a list of the things Finland is now buying with the money which the Export-Import Bank has already loaned to Finland. The list includes many articles besides the three mentioned by the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. Those are the three principal items.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. In answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Wyoming, it is my opinion that, in the first place, the passage of such a resolution would not violate either the spirit of neutrality or the neutrality law.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I agree with the Senator in that statement.

Mr. HARRISON. It is simply a matter of asking the Securities and Exchange Commission to expedite the consideration of the application, should an application for the registration of bonds for sale in this country be made. Whether any actual good would come from the passage of the resolution I do not know. In my opinion it would. At least, the passage of the resolution would express the sense of this body that we are somewhat sympathetic toward Finland. I am sympathetic toward Finland, and I prefer to see the proposed financial arrangement made through the private sale of bonds to individual Americans rather than to see the money come out of the Treasury of the United States. That is one of the reasons why I submitted the resolution. I hope the effect will be the formation of a group of leading American citizens to make application on behalf of the Republic of Finland to the Securities and Exchange Commission; and I hope that the campaign for the sale of Finnish bonds will be successful. The proceeds of the bonds could be used for the purchase of implements of war, which Finland may not buy under the proposed loan from the Export-Import Bank which we have discussed. If the bonds are sold to individual American investors, Finland may use the money in any way it wishes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Then, if I understand correctly, the effect of the resolution would be to make clear to the country and to those who are sympathetic with Finland, and who desire to see Finland receive money from the nationals of this country which may be used for the real need of Finland, namely, the purchase of military supplies, that the Senate is in sympathy with the flotation of such a Finnish loan in this country and desires to expedite any application that may be made. It is also clear that the registration and sale of such bonds in this country would not violate international law.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. I do not want to hold out any false hopes to Finland or to anyone who may represent Finland. That is why I said in the beginning of this discussion that Finnish bonds are now being sold in this country, I think, for less than 45 cents on the dollar. Of course, it would look somewhat foolish to some gentlemen to suggest that an American investor would pay a hundred cents when he could get the same security for 45 cents. If the expression of the proceedings were expedited under resolution and the bonds of Finland were registered, the purchaser of the bonds would be dictated by a sympathetic and patriotic impulse, and not from the investment standpoint.

I believe if Finland shall win the war that the bonds will be duly paid; if Finland shall not win the war, it will be too bad. But the American investor is pretty sensible and generally does not pay a hundred dollars for a bond that he can get for 45 cents on the dollar, unless he is moved by something else than the mere thought of profit or return.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Finland has already demonstrated that its bonds are good, that its credit is good, and that so long as it is free it will repay to its creditors any debt it may incur.

Mr. HARRISON. The Finns have a wonderful record in that respect, and I believe that many people in America who are possessed of wealth and who say they do not want to invest their money now are at times moved by very patriotic impulses. They pay very large income taxes under the present law, as high as 75 percent in the last surtax bracket. There is a chance, if they should lose on the investment in Finnish bonds, that they might claim some deduction for the loss incurred, and I am inclined to believe that with that thought in mind certain individuals who would not otherwise lend $5,000 or even $100 would buy these bonds.

Then, too, it will be remembered that under our present law, in certain circumstances, we impose a gift tax. In other words, sometimes when one gives he is required to pay a tax. If bonds or Finnish securities are purchased in this country, it will largely be the result of the patriotic and sympathetic impulses of our people. Even if they should not sell $5,000,000 or even $1,000,000 of bonds, they could at least sell that amount and use the funds for the purchase of what it is stated they need. I think we ought to give encouragement to Finland in this matter to the extent of at least expressing the sense of the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, let me express my appreciation to Senators who have been kind enough to answer my various questions.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator now?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. It has been related to me by some who are interested in Finland's protection and who have given much of their time without any compensation or any hope of compensation to soliciting funds for Finland, that many persons have tendered checks provided that the money which they were willing to contribute might be utilized for military purposes, but when they were told that those who were receiving contributions could use them only for nonmilitary purposes they expressed the hope that there would soon be issued bonds so that they might buy bonds even though they should never receive a return for their investment in order to help Finland to purchase the necessary military supplies to defend herself against this cowardly assault by the Bolshevik Government.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I shall say merely a word, in conclusion, as to the practical result of the adoption of this resolution. The Commission could take the action, anyway, probably, but the adoption of the resolution might be persuasive in giving priority to the consideration of an application for the registration of Finnish bonds over other bonds, and in that way expedite the issuance of the bonds.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. As I understand the present law, Finland or any other country can make application to the Securities and Exchange Commission for the purpose contemplated by the resolution? The only difference is that the resolution suggests to the Commission that it expedite action in case Finland shall make application?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct; that is the only thing in it.

Mr. WALSH. And any other neutral could do the same thing?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; any other neutral could do the same thing. Under our present neutrality law, England, France, and Germany could not do it, because we deny credit to them, but any neutral country—and that is still the status of Finland—may make application, and the resolution, as the Senator says, suggests to the Commission, as an expression of our desire and our feeling, that the procedure be expedited, which might mean priority over other applications.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, this resolution did not come before the Foreign Relations Committee; there was no matter touching it pending before the committee. It had no relation whatever to the bill under consideration, namely, Senate bill 3069, which was reported from the Banking and Currency Committee, and then referred to the Foreign Relations Committee. However, prior to the meeting of the committee the Senator from Mississippi had offered publicly his resolution; it was lying on the table, subject to action, and was no longer a secret. The question would naturally arise, as it has arisen here today whether it would be advisable to recommend, as an expression of the sentiment of the Senate, that the Securities and Exchange Commission expedite any application for the registration of Finnish bonds, and whether or not it would be beneficial to Finland to issue such bonds.

Some think it would be and others think it will not be. I do not know how we shall find that out until it is tried. Personally, I think Finland would be able to sell the bonds to those who would be willing to make gifts to Finland. I believe Finland would prefer to have money in the form of loans rather than in the form of gifts. In my opinion, the Finnish people despise charity, and do not want gifts. If such provision is made that loans can be made to Finland for the purpose of buying what Finland needs, there will be some charitable people in this country who will buy Finnish bonds at par. That is my view of it. But that is not the question.

The question having been submitted to this body whether if application is made it should be expedited, that question has got to be answered now, and any Senator who votes "no" at this time is placing the Finnish Government in a very embarrassing position, not through any fault of its own. Since the subject is before the Senate, the Senate is only asked one question, and it has got to answer that question yes or no. The question is, Does the Senate favor the Securities and Exchange Commission expediting the registration of any application for the issuance of bonds by Finland? Everyone knows that it is legal at the present time to issue such bonds; everyone knows that there are two or three thousand applications pending before the Commission for registration that probably will not be reached within 6 months; and the resolution asks the Commission when legal applications for the registration of Finnish bonds are made to them, in view of the serious situation in Finland, with which we sympathize, that they expedite the registration of the bonds. The adoption of the resolution would have no effect save to serve as an expression of our sympathy; and I do not think we should hesitate even for a moment to discuss a question of that kind.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I rise to speak to the pending resolution for a few moments. Tomorrow I expect to speak to the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations. The resolution simply provides that it is the sense of the Senate that the Securities and Exchange Commission shall expedite—and I would add the words "the hearing of"—applications for Finnish loans. If that is the intention of the resolution, it seems to me that we are doing two very fine things. We are giving a legal expression, at least in one sense, to the way our hearts beat, and we are also expressing what the people of this country feel. I said we are giving legal expression to our sentiments; but I am decidedly against, and will say so tomorrow more emphatically than I do now in an amendment which will then be proposed to the bill to this country loaning money to Finland, because I think such action would violate international law and transcend the powers of Congress. I am not, however, against speaking up in the Halls of Congress against an international rapist. Just a few months ago one of the distinguished Senators on the other side of the aisle made a very wonderful address in which he showed how down through the years America has always had the stamina to register its protest against international violence and international crimes. I do that now in relation to this very resolution. I am in favor of adopting it, because it provides the only way I can see, outside of donations, in which the American people—not the Government, but the American people—can help a worthy people such as the Finnish people.

So I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, we are all seeking the most practical way to help Finland. In my judgment, the most practical way to help Finland is to find some way to stop sending to Russia materials with which to destroy Finland.

On January 27, before the Del-Mar-Va Press Association, I delivered an address on this country's gold and silver policies, in the course of which I made incidental reference to the inconsistency between our efforts to help Finland on the one hand, and the actual and much greater help which this country all along has been giving to Soviet Russia as one of the results of the United States' policy of buying any and all gold sent here from any country.

After the delivery of that speech on January 27, statements got into circulation tending to minimize the significance of what I had said about our purchases of Russian gold.

In referring to the purchases of Russian gold I had in mind, and I still have in mind, not only gold shipped to this country directly from Russia, but the much more important benefits which Russia obtains through the sale of gold to other countries which then remelt it and ship it to us.

Not all Russian gold comes here by way of third countries. I should like to read the Senate an article which was published in this morning's Washington Times-Herald:

SOVIET SHIP LANDS GOLD CARGO IN UNITED STATES—$5,600,000 IN BULLION REACHES COAST

SAN FRANCISCO, February 7.—The Russian freighter Kim today unloaded approximately $5,600,000 in bar gold to the United States Mint, after a secret dash across the Pacific from Vladivostok.

The gold, more than 160,000 ounces, required 4 hours to transfer to armored cars. It was consigned to the Chase National Bank, New York.

The Kim, riding high out of the water, carried no other cargo on its 16-day voyage.

It had come all the way over to bring this gold.

I quote further:

It docked here last night, the first Russian ship to enter the Golden Gate since last summer.

GOLD PRECAUTIONS USUAL, SAYS CUSTOMS

Treasury officials last night refused to discuss a shipment of approximately $5,600,000 in bar gold from Soviet Russia, unloaded in San Francisco, but apparently were aware that the shipment had arrived.

It was pointed out, however, that the precautions taken by customs officials were not unusual.

Russian gold figured in the news here earlier this week when Senator JOHN G. TOWNSEND, Jr. (Democrat), of Delaware, accused the Treasury of aiding Russia by purchasing the Soviet's gold. He charged the Treasury was buying all of Russia's annual gold production which he estimated at $175,000,000.

Secretary of Treasury Henry Morgenthau said the Treasury maintains a policy of "nondiscrimination," purchasing gold from any and all countries offering it.

A Federal Reserve Board report issued last night said the latest estimate available of Russia's annual production, based on unofficial information, placed the 1938 total at $184,000,000.

Yesterday's shipment can either be sold directly to the Treasury at $35 an ounce, minus a small service charge, or deposited with some Federal Reserve bank. If sold, Russia would obtain American dollars with which to make purchases in this country.

The Kim may sell that gold for $35 an ounce to our country, and may be loaded with war materials to be taken back to Russia to destroy Finland. So I say the most practical manner in which we can help Finland is to find some method by which we can stop sending to other countries materials to destroy Finland, and taking in return gold for which we have no use.

Mr. President, on March 12, 1939, the Philadelphia Record published an appeal to the Congress of the United States in the form of an editorial entitled "Stop Buying Gold." In the editorial, reference is made to another editorial published in the Saturday Evening Post of March 11, 1939. I ask consent that there be printed at this point in the RECORD the two editorials to which I have just referred.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of March 11, 1939]

STOP BUYING GOLD

To the Congress of the United States.

GENTLEMEN: Not much time is left to save America from the folly of its gold-purchase program.

Stop it, gentlemen, now.

Three and one-half years ago the Record published an editorial, Will Uncle Sam Pay for the Next World War? In that editorial we said:

"If Europe sends us more billions of gold bullion, we will store it in Federal Treasury vaults. Europe will take wheat, cotton, machinery in exchange.

"That gold will give us the right to buy what we want when we want it from Europe—unless Europe repudiates gold as the basis of its monetary systems. If European nations do that, Uncle Sam will be left with a great hoard of practically valueless yellow metal.

"We have had enough experience with the inherent selfishness of nations not to think that any moral obligation or spirit of fair play would prevent Europe from playing us just such a trick. Anyone who predicted in 1920 that the Allied debt would be repudiated in 1930 would have been denounced as a poltroon. Certainly that $10,000,000,000 lesson ought not to be forgotten so soon."

Gentlemen of the Congress, when that editorial was written Uncle Sam's gold hoard had piled up to $10,000,000,000.

Last July our gold hoard hit $13,000,000,000—the biggest pile of gold ever in possession of any nation since the dawn of time.

Last October the gold hoard passed the $14,000,000,000 mark.

Next week, gentlemen, the gold hoard will pass the $15,000,000,000 mark.

Next week we will have nearly two-thirds of all the monetary gold in the world. In exchange for it we will have given the fruits of our labors, the resources of our soil, the products of our factories, a lien upon our economy.

In all we have paid fifteen billions, every penny of which was earned by American workers, who will get no benefit from the gold, but they will be faced with one of the most devastating collapses of economic history if the day of repudiation dawns.

Fifteen billions of gold.

The Nation, fortunately, is waking up. Many conservatives have been opposed to the gold policy as well as most liberals.

This week even the Saturday Evening Post comes out with an editorial which echoes our own contentions of the past 42 months.

We have been called visionary. We have been chided for seeing ghosts in our forecast of gold repudiation. But the Saturday Evening Post says:

"Great Britain possesses only a pygmy pile, amounting to about $3,000,000,000, while the Bank of France, which has always sought to maintain a large gold war chest, has only about $2,500,000,000. In consequence, as gold continues to keep coming in to the President, his fix begins to resemble the fix of the little boy who engineered a corner in the marbles market.

"Because the more gold the President acquires, the less gold other nations have. And having less, the stake of the other nations in gold as a monetary medium diminishes. Thus, the other nations have less and less incentive to try to support the price of gold; they have less and less reason to try to hold on to their declining reserves. And some day those other nations may decide that gold is not really of much economic use anyway—only for watch cases and trinkets and filling teeth—and then they may determine to let the President have all the gold they have. In which case the gold would have no market.

"Which would be very serious * * * for the citizens of the United States."

Yes; we would have cornered the gold market. And we would be faced, first, with a huge mound of useless metal; second, with the economic consequences to both our foreign and domestic trade from the outlawing by the rest of the world of the international money which we had so cleverly hogged.

Gold! Gold! Gold!

If we keep on acquiring it at the present rate, in another 3½ years we will have all the gold in the world.

Already we have subsidized the world arms race to the tune of five billions. We have sent planes, bombs, raw materials, ships, guns, * * * in exchange for gold. We have traded scrap iron for living warriors of Japan in exchange for gold from the teeth of dead warriors.

We are, as Brazil's Foreign Minister Aranha is reported to have told the State Department, undermining our own foreign trade by taking more and more gold—which keeps the dollar high in foreign exchange, the pound and franc low. That permits France and England to undersell us everywhere, especially in South America, where we hope for so much.

Gold! Gold mines everywhere working overtime to sell us more of the metal at twice the cost of its production.

No wonder conservatives and liberals alike are fearful. No wonder even those conservatives who always have regarded gold as something sacred are beginning to recognize that it could easily pass out of the picture as money—and become just another metal.

Gentlemen of the Congress, act—before it is too late. Before we become a nation cursed as was Midas the King.

[From the Saturday Evening Post for March 11, 1939]

A WAR WE SEEM TO BE LOSING

Through our program for armament expansion, we recently have shown ourselves very conscious of the danger of a world war—a war which has not yet begun at this writing. In fact, we have concentrated so intensely on the possibility of this war that we have paid relatively little attention to another world war—a war already on.

The war already on is an economic war, and it is not going very well for us. Even the most optimistic patriot could only conclude that we are losing, after looking over the news from the various fronts.

It would take a thick volume to cover the news on all fronts. But a look at a few will give anybody an insight into the nature of the war and the way it is going.

In Mexico, a totalitarian government, very largely supported by our Government's purchase of silver at higher than world prices, repaid our extremely unenlightened self-interest by grabbing American-owned oil properties in the name of communism. Then the Mexican Government sold the oil stolen in the name of communism to the Fascist countries—Germany, Italy, and Japan.

We also did some gold buying. In the 5 years from 1934 through 1938, inclusive, the President swapped more than 7,500,000,000 American dollars for 215,600,000 ounces of gold. The gold was deposited here, underground, returning to the earth whence it came.

Each time the President acquired gold he boosted the gold stock of the United States and correspondingly reduced the available gold supplies of other nations until, by the end of 1938, the President was sitting on the greatest pile of gold ever amassed by any single potentate. In the depositories of the United States Treasury reposed 55 percent of the world's supply.

Compared to the President's $14,500,000,000 hoard of gold, Great Britain possesses only a pygmy pile, amounting to about $3,000,000,000, while the Bank of France, which has always sought to maintain a large gold war chest, has only about $2,500,000,000. In consequence, as gold continues to keep coming in to the President, his fix begins to resemble the fix of the little boy who engineered a corner in the marbles market.

Because the more gold the President acquires the less gold other nations have, and, having less, the stake of the other nations in gold as a monetary medium diminishes. Thus, the other nations have less and less incentive to try to support the price of gold; they have less and less reason to try to hold on to their declining reserves; and, some day, those other nations may decide that gold is not really of much economic use anyway—only for watchcases and trinkets and filling teeth—and then they may determine to let the President have all the gold they have—in which case the gold would have no market.

Which would be very serious, not only for the President but for the citizens of the United States. For gold, it so happens, is an expensive collector's item. Every time the President receives an ounce of gold he gives in exchange 35 American dollars. And foreigners use those dollars to acquire (1) American goods and services; (2) American bonds and stocks; (3) deposit balances in American banks, which represent a future call on American goods and services and American bonds and stocks. In other words, in exchange for this gold which he buries under the ground at Fort Knox, Ky., the President swaps American cash, goods, and dividends.

The mention of dividends brings up a more striking example of the nature of the economic war and the way it is going. In 1929, when Adolf Hitler was only a joke, even to Germans, General Motors bought the Adam Opel Co., with its $35,000,000 plant at Russelsheim, Germany. General Motors still owns this business, but being the owner is about all the satisfaction General Motors gets out of it. Not that it isn't profitable. Since 1934 Opel's profits have averaged $4,000,000 a year. But General Motors stockholders haven't been able to touch a cent of those profits.

Germany's magic method of blocking marks, prohibiting any money from passing out of the country, has kept those profits, rightfully belonging to American investors, in Germany. Stockholders of General Motors are not the only sufferers. General Electric, International Business Machines, Socony-Vacuum Oil, American Radiator, International Harvester, Texas Corporation, and a lot of others are in the same fix.

Meanwhile not only the German Government but German companies and individuals have been gaily collecting with both hands from us. All of the many American companies in which they own control or an interest have paid them dividends regularly.

Money made for Americans in Germany remained in Germany. Money made for Germans in America went to Germany.

What can be done about it?

It is quite true that economic aggression, when followed by economic reprisal, leads to military aggression and war. But by our rearmament program we have served notice on the totalitarian countries that we do not intend to take military aggression lying down. Isn't it about time that we took steps to make clear that we do not intend to take economic aggression lying down either? Or should we lose the economic war that is on, by default?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to detain the Senate, but I should like to make one or two observations on the pending resolution.

In the first place, it has been suggested that the resolution has no legal effect, has no force in law. Everyone will grant that. The Senate, however, has often expressed its sense. I very well recall that the Senate expressed its sense that a Cabinet member should be removed by the Executive. Of course, the Senate had no jurisdiction in the premises, but it did desire to express its sense that that particular action should be taken. It might have been said—indeed, it was said by a distinguished Senator who has recently passed away—that the Senate was not only lacking in jurisdiction but was actually encroaching upon the jurisdiction of the Executive; and yet the Senate adopted a resolution expressing its sense that a Cabinet officer should be removed.

Frequently we have condemned "the terrible Turks" and other peoples about the earth, and in the last analysis we have chosen the mere expression of opinion as the vehicle by which we carried that condemnation.

Mr. President, I do not think the adoption of this resolution would be an empty gesture by any manner of means. That is to say, I do not believe it would be an empty proceeding, or meaningless, if the Republic of Finland should follow up the resolution and should register bonds for sale in this market; nor do I think it would be worthless or useless even if the Republic of Finland should not follow up the resolution and should not offer bonds in this market. Undoubtedly, to have access to the greatest market on earth, unquestionably to have an invitation to come into that market and float its bonds, is a powerful stabilizing influence for any nation in peace or in war, but particularly when it is fighting with its back to the wall in a desperate struggle for existence.

Finland will not get arms from the United States in any large quantities, even if this Government makes a direct loan to her. If she obtains arms she must obtain them from countries nearer by. She desperately needs arms, and she desperately needs manpower. Arms alone will not suffice. I regret to say that in my opinion Finland not only must have arms and munitions and implements of war but she must have manpower. She must obtain in some other nation credits for the things that are vital to her very existence. Is it not worth something to Finland, is it not worth something to the nations through which she must receive her implements of war and her munitions, the things vital to her existence, to know that she has here access to a money market second to none on the face of the globe? Does it not give her credit? Does it not give her standing? Does it not give her stamina which is easily translatable into actual necessities which she must now have if she is to survive, assuming that the war is to go on for a long time?

Mr. President, not only that, but undoubtedly—I am not speaking about our neutrality law—it is an unneutral act for any nation to make an unrestricted advance of money to another nation when the latter nation is a party to an actually existing war. I made that statement here before. There appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee two able representatives from the State Department, and that statement was not controverted by them. It has been the recognized law of nations since the days of John Adams. It is an unneutral act under international law for a nation, as such, to make a loan to another nation that is actually engaged in war. It makes no difference whether or not war has actually been declared. We have a notion that because a state of war is not declared to exist, war does not exist. Under our Neutrality Act that is only technically true. Actually, if war exists, and one nation makes a loan of money with which one of the belligerents may purchase anything and everything—battleships, machine guns, poison gas—it is an unneutral act under international law. It is not necessary to look to the lawbooks to find that that is so. It is founded upon the clearest principles.

Mr. President, not only is that so, but likewise it is not always a neutral act for one country to permit another country to borrow within its territory, of its citizens, when the other country is engaged in war. It is not always an unneutral act, but it sometimes is. So I think that the adoption of the pending resolution will be of benefit to Finland, because it will be a declaration upon our part, if we adopt it, that the action is not intended as a violation of our neutrality.

I know that it is beneficial to Finland, fighting with her back to the wall, to know and to be able to say to the countries on this globe through which, and through which alone, she can obtain the necessary materials and manpower, that the markets of the United States are open to her. It is not an empty gesture, by any means; it is a service to the Finnish nation, as it always is a service to individuals or to small nations, or even great nations, to know that they have friends where friendship can count, and that that fact may be impressed upon others with whom they must have dealings which are essential to their very existence. It may encourage and may indirectly profit Finland. Assuming that Finland never takes advantage, never offers to register a single bond, the fact remains that our markets are open. Great Britain and France know they are open; all the world knows that the American money market is open for the purchase of Finnish bonds if Finland desires to take advantage of this market.

The war will not last always; and if Finland survives the possibility of securing credit in the United States, demonstrated by the action of the Senate of the United States in the very hour of her travail and danger of possible extinction, will be another strong and stabilizing factor in the recovery of the Finnish nation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senate might be interested to hear that yesterday before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations considering the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill, the Commissioner of Customs, Mr. Basil Harris, gave some interesting testimony relating to the present condition of American exports to Russia. He gave it as his offhand guess that this trade for the year just ended amounted to $80,000,000, more than for the preceding year, and that the exports consisted of copper, oil, and tin plate, among other things. Further investigation developed that this trade, which totaled $3,000,000 in July, had risen to $10,000,000 in December.

I submit this information at this time because it seems to me it is very pertinent to the question involved in the resolution before us, and in connection with what we are going to do for Finland. It is not difficult to imagine that these shipments will be disadvantageous to Finland and advantageous to Germany and to Russia.

This knowledge causes me humbly to submit this consideration to the Senate, that if, instead of repealing the arms embargo law last fall we had extended it to nations such as Russia, we would not now be facing the thoroughly repulsive picture of American materials helping Russia in the present conflict.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

COMPARISON OF STATE, FEDERAL, AND PRIVATE DEBTS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, in recent days there has been discussion as to the relative comparison between public and private debts. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD as part of my remarks an official statement as to public and private debts.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from what source that is gathered.

Mr. BYRD. I will say to the Senator that the State and local debt figures are those carried in the 1939 report of the Secretary of the Treasury as securities of States, counties, and cities, and so forth, wholly exempt from Federal taxation.

The Federal debt figures are those carried in the 1939 Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury in a table showing source of public debt increase or decrease, fiscal years 1915 to 1939.

The private debt figures are the total of private long-term debt plus bank loans as compiled by Louis H. Bean and P. H. Bollinger, in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture, and officially published in a Government release by the A. A. A. division of program planning, agricultural relations section, entitled "The Present Job of Government and Private Capital."

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Comparison of debts, State and local, Federal, private, 1929–40

1929	$16,760,000,000	$16,931,000,000	$124,700,000,000	$158,391,000,000

WORLD DAY OF PRAYER

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, last year I spoke briefly in the Senate concerning the World Day of Prayer, February 9. At that time I voiced the hope that the united prayers of men and women of peace would bring peace throughout the world. The peace that we have sought has not come. Instead there has been an outbreak of hostilities in western Europe, which threatens to grow ever more terrible. Under these conditions there is but one court of last appeal, and that is to the God of the nations. Again we should bring to Him our cares and sorrows, resting with Him the cause of peace we so prayerfully seek.

I rejoice in every action our Government has taken recently in behalf of mediation and peace. Nothing can be gained for the welfare of mankind through war which cannot better and more permanently be achieved through peace. Again I wish to call upon the President to exert the complete moral and spiritual influence of his great office to enlist America in the cause of world peace. Were we at war great sacrifices would be demanded of us. Now that we are at peace we should be willing to make the sacrifices necessary to win peacefully what war can never bring.

We should not be discouraged if the first prayers we make for peace are unrewarded. We shall have peace when our prayers are fully supported in lives thoroughly in harmony with brotherhood and good will. So long as we continue to pray for peace and act for war we shall have division, conflict, and prevailing anarchy.

As the World Day of Prayer draws near I wish to add my voice to those of thousands of true-hearted folk who believe that God has made of one family all the nations of the earth and that all of us are called to live together in the spirit of peace and fraternal understanding.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a letter addressed to me by Margaret T. Applegarth, chairman of the Committee on World Day of Prayer, together with a brief radio speech to be broadcast over the Columbia Broadcasting System from station WABC, on February 9.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL COMMITTEE OF CHURCH WOMEN,
New York City, February 2, 1940.

Senator DAVIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR DAVIS: Last year our World Day of Prayer committee was greatly delighted to read your splendid words in regard to the World Day of Prayer, which we found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 84, page 1818; this was so warm-hearted an endorsement that we reprinted part of it in our 1940 Handbook, a page of which I enclose, together with the new service for use on Friday, February 9, and the call to prayer—in the hope that you may be able to make opportunity again either to refer to the world-wide observance of the day in 50 countries, or even to have part of the service used in the Senate worship period on the 9th. We believe very deeply in the power and influence of such services, and would deeply appreciate your continued interest, which has been of such value in the past.

Most sincerely yours,

MARGARET T. APPLEGARTH,
Chairman.

WORLD DAY OF PRAYER RADIO BROADCAST, FEBRUARY 9, 1940

As we were going to bed last evening, a very marvelous thing was beginning to happen in the world—and it is continuing all through this first Friday in lent. For during the dark hours of the night, while we were sleeping, it was already morning in the Fiji Islands, and large groups of eager new Christian women were wending their way to a union gathering in their meeting house "to pray for a spirit of oneness with the women of the world"—your world and mine.

I find it a singularly beautiful thing to realize that for over 25 years this World Day of Prayer has followed the course of the sun around our earth on each first Friday in lent, with women in more than 50 countries dropping their usual household and business tasks to devote a quiet half day to bear the weight of the world in their hearts. For no sooner had the Fiji Islanders finished the first of their services, than morning came to New Zealand also, and other enthusiastic groups of women began praying in Wellington, Aukland, Christchurch, as well as in Australia, at Victoria, Sydney, Melbourne, and those smaller towns, whose names there is no time to mention.

For the years have proved that neither snow nor rain, nor hail nor gloom of night, can keep these women from their appointed meetings on the World Day of Prayer; and, nation by nation—the Orient, Europe, Africa, both the Americas—will also begin praying, each in their own tongue, until—after 40 hours—this significant day of prayer will have ended on St. Lawrence Island, off the coast of Alaska, 30 miles from the Arctic Circle and 30 miles from the international date line.

And why do I call it significant? Not only because women in more than 50 countries will meet to worship; not only because the same printed program has been translated into all their languages and dialects in order that everyone may know the one theme for their united thought, "In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength." This is altogether significant and beautiful, of course, but the truly moving quality in such a day of prayer lies in the fact that even in this world crisis, when hatreds and divisions and upheavals are shattering all nations, here are millions of women reaching out toward the one power and the one force strong enough to bind their world together. And so, overlooking all national lines, all racial lines, all battle lines, in quietness and in confidence they will pray that each Christian may recover into his or her own life something of the astonishing loveliness which lay in Jesus Christ.

Therefore let us dwell rapidly on the various picturesque processions undoubtedly gathering at this very moment. Certain friendly and spectacular aspects of the day of prayer color all these national observances. For instance, in Egypt, the Greek Orthodox and the Coptic Churches join in the union meetings. In Argentina, South America, the Salvation Army feels a sense of responsibility for services in 40 different places; throughout the Orient and America many Young Women's Christian Associations hold services; in France the McCall Mission observes the day in each of its centers. Last year, at a special children's service, a small boy prayed: "Lord, grant that men may fight no longer but may learn to shake hands."

For the eleventh year the American Church in Athens will be filled to the doors with Greeks, Armenians, Turks, and English. And in the large cathedral in Johannesburg, South Africa, a racial drama of great beauty and of even greater meaning will be enacted, as side by side there will kneel down Zulus and Kaffirs and half castes, factory girls, native women, and the English and American residents. Perhaps no meeting in the world will be quite as brilliant a sight, for if Johannesburg repeats its former color scheme, the Methodists will be in red blouses, the Presbyterians in white, the Anglicans in long white tunics with small crosses hanging from chains, other denominations distinctive with fur caps, white knitted caps, etc. But everything reverent and majestic, with some hymns sung in Zulu, some in the Secuto dialect, the perfect rhythm of the rich, warm voices rising gloriously to the Lord of all nations and kindreds and tribes.

In Scotland there will be meetings from Edinburgh to Orkney and the western isles; throughout all England the usual 290 centers will continue to observe this World Day of Prayer, as indeed will Denmark, Holland, Sweden, Norway, for, more than ever, in wartime the hearts of women will turn to the God of All Peace.

Perhaps no city has been more war-torn and weary and baffled than Shanghai; yet year after year the Chinese have continued the deep enthusiasm of their union service in which 18 different nationalities take part. For, besides the women of China, there will also be present today women of Japan, Korea, India, Germany, Russia, France, Holland, Sweden, America, Great Britain, and the Philippines. Last year in Shanghai a very startling moment in their celebration brought a holy hush on the entire audience, for Japanese and Chinese women from opposite aisles approached a large central candle to light their own small candles; then, side by side down the same aisle, they returned to the audience, going from pew to pew to share their light with the unlighted candles which each woman in that huge church was holding. All this earnest friendliness in spite of bombings, desolations, deaths. They had become one in the discovery and the sharing of light.

It is the symbol of this beautiful day of prayer throughout the world that it should need 40 hours to round out its cycle instead of the usual 24. For tonight, as we shall be going to bed, a new day will be dawning in Honolulu, where Hawaiians, Chinese, Japanese, Americans, Spanish, and English will meet to pray for peace between their beloved homelands. And then, far to the north, only 30 miles from the Arctic Circle, the world day of prayer will end in ice and snow on St. Lawrence Island, where the Indians and the Eskimos have been frozen in since last October, unable to receive even mail until next May. But the spirit of Jesus Christ knows no time limits, no clime limits, so that there will be light there with them when there is night here with us, and I love knowing that Eskimo women will be praying that we may bind our world together into a safer, happier home for the children of men.

Therefore, in the warn consciousness of our mutual concern one for the other, let each woman in America delight to share in the sacred binding of ourselves to God on this world day of prayer; that His kingdom may come; that His will may be done upon earth—among all people, beginning with ourselves.

LEGISLATIVE BARRIERS BETWEEN STATES

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on March 13, 1939, I offered a resolution in this body which related to legislative barriers between States. We know the history of such legislative efforts in the past. We know that our Constitution came into being largely because States at that time erected artificial barriers to the free flow of commerce between the States. This particular resolution, Senate Resolution 101, seems still to abide in the pockets of the committee. I give notice that in the very near future I shall move to discharge the committee in the hope that the resolution may then be considered on the floor of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. PITTMAN) as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably from that committee the following nominations:

David Gray, of Florida, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Ireland; and Louis G. Dreyfus, Jr., of California, now Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Iran, to be also Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Afghanistan.

Mr. GUFFEY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the nomination of George H. Earle 3d, of Pennsylvania, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Bulgaria.

Mr. WAGNER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported favorably the following nominations:

Chester C. Davis, of Maryland, to be a member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System for a term of 14 years from February 1, 1940, vice Marriner S. Eccles; and Marriner S. Eccles, of Utah, to be a member of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System for the unexpired portion of the term of 8 years from February 1, 1936, vice Chester C. Davis.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the reports of committees.

The clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Paul Edwards, of New York, to be Work Projects Administrator for the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTER, GREENSBURG, PA., REPORTED ADVERSELY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Kathleen McT. Gregg to be postmaster at Greensburg, Pa., which had been reported adversely from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

The nomination was rejected.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters reported favorably.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of postmasters favorably reported be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA WORKS PROJECTS ADMINISTRATOR—RECONSIDERATION

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire what committee favorably reported the nomination of Paul Edwards, of New York, to be Work Projects Administrator for the District of Columbia?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KING. I have just received some information which induces me to ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which the nomination was confirmed, and that action on the nomination be deferred until the next executive session of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which the nomination was confirmed will be reconsidered, and action on the nomination will be postponed until the next executive session of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to make a statement concerning the nomination of Paul Edwards to be Work Projects Administrator for the District of Columbia. The subcommittee which investigated the matter and reported the nomination made an examination which I think was quite thorough, and obtained a report on all the questions asked. We believe the nominee is thoroughly qualified and fitted for the position. There was some suggestion concerning trouble between him and Representative BYRNS of my State. I talked with Representative BYRNS about it, and he told me that that matter had been entirely adjusted, and he was entirely satisfied with the nomination. Therefore, I will say to the Senator, the Appropriations Committee made a favorable report.

Mr. KING. I have no information other than an indirect message which was just received. I have no personal objection to Mr. Edwards. Indeed, I believe he is competent for the position. But in view of the information which I have received, I felt that perhaps it was my duty to ask that the nomination go over until the next executive session.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere with any further inquiries which may be made respecting Mr. Edwards. I am gratified to hear the Senator from Tennessee make the statement he has concerning Mr. Edwards. Mr. Edwards is a man of high character. I am informed that he has done his job thoroughly and well, and that he is industrious and reliable in all respects.

I do not want the postponement to be regarded as any kind of a reflection upon Mr. Edwards. If the Senator insists upon a postponement I shall not oppose it. However, I do not want to have the Senator form an impression upon mere rumor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, so far as I know Mr. Edwards is very competent; and upon the information which I have I should vote for his confirmation. However, inasmuch as a resident of the District of Columbia has made a protest, I feel that it is my duty to ask that the nomination go over until tomorrow.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have no objection to the nomination going over until tomorrow. I do not know Mr. Edwards, but we were careful to have an independent investigation made by an impartial authority, in addition to hearing from those who employed him; and I am sure that the committee has reached a proper conclusion in recommending his nomination.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I shall not raise any objection to Mr. Edwards. All the information I have is to the effect that he is a very fine person. However, I think it is about time that the people of the District of Columbia had their own appointees, without going to some other States to obtain the best man. It seems to me that it is a reflection on the people of the District of Columbia to go elsewhere to obtain what we call a good man. It seems to me that the people of the District of Columbia are suffering under enough handicaps by reason of having no voice in their own government, without having to go elsewhere, whether it be to New York or to New Mexico, to find an appointee to administer public business in the District of Columbia. The information I have is that Mr. Edwards is a first-class citizen and a very fine official.

Mr. WAGNER. I am very glad to have the Senator say so. I wish to assure the Senator that, to my knowledge, Mr. Edwards' appointment is in no sense a political appointment. He was chosen purely because of his unusual capacity to do this kind of work.

Mr. CHAVEZ. The point I am trying to make is that I, for one, would not like to feel that there is no one in the District of Columbia who could do the job as well as Mr. Edwards.

Mr. WAGNER. I have no information on that subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nomination will be passed over until the next session.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, February 9, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAYBURN].

Rabbi Louis Wolsey, D. D., Congregation Rodeph Shalom, Philadelphia, Pa., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God of all the peoples of the world, in whose hands are the fate and the destiny of the children of men, and before whom all the families of the earth are as one brotherhood, we come to Thee to ask that Thy spirit may rest upon this Congress, that forth from this place may go those influences that shall make for justice and for freedom. Do Thou consecrate us, O God, unto freedom, that liberty to speak and to do, not in whispers but loudly and with courage, to know and to think, to toil and to be rewarded, and to share with our neighbor and with our world. Dedicate this House, O God, to Thy Divine truths and Thy Divine laws, and when the nations stir up wrath against one another do Thou cause this great House to be an instrumentality for peace. Bless the Speaker of this House and restore him to health and to his responsibility. Bless all the officers of this great Nation that they may rule and guide in justice and in peace. And finally, O God, do Thou establish the work of their hands, yea, the work of their hands establish Thou it. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE JOHN M. MOORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time for the purpose of announcing the death of a former distinguished Member of this House. On the 3d day of this month, John M. Moore, Sr., died at his home in Richmond, Tex., at the age of 77 years. He was a former member of the Texas Legislature, and from 1905 to 1913 represented the old Eighth Congressional District in Congress, the district at that time embracing the city of Houston, with adjoining counties, including Fort Bend in which Mr. Moore resided. After serving 8 years in Congress Mr. Moore voluntarily retired, although assured of reelection without an opponent. He preferred the atmosphere of his happy home life to that of politics. He also possessed large property interests to which he wished to devote his attention, consisting principally of banking, farming, and stock raising. Mr. Moore was a man of splendid ability and sterling qualities. His passing is a distinctive loss to his State and to the Nation.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR MILITARY AND NAVAL ESTABLISHMENTS, COAST GUARD, AND FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 7805) making supplemental appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments, Coast Guard, and Federal Bureau of Investigation, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7805) "Making supplemental appropriations for the Military and Naval Establishments, Coast Guard, and Federal Bureau of Investigation, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, and for other purposes," submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

On Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, relating to the Military Establishment: Appropriates $15,000,000 for field exercises of the Army as proposed by the Senate instead of $18,000,000 as proposed by the House; provides, as proposed by the Senate, for an alternate officer to be designated by the Secretary of War to approve claims for damages growing out of operations in connection with field exercises of the Army appropriated for in the bill; appropriates $21,962,564 as proposed by the Senate instead of $22,962,564 as proposed by the House for Army transportation; restores the House provision, stricken out by the Senate, appropriating $200,000 for the acquisition of land in Puerto Rico for the establishment of a general depot, etc.; appropriates $9,750,000, instead of $9,500,000 as proposed by the Senate and $10,000,000 as proposed by the House, for barracks and quarters and other utilities; and inserts the provision, proposed by the Senate, limiting to 4 cents the mileage allowance to members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when called into active service training for 30 days or less.

On Nos. 10 to 14, inclusive, relating to the Navy: Appropriates $18,363,000 for the Bureau of Engineering as proposed by the Senate instead of $18,818,000 as proposed by the House; appropriates $14,969,000 as proposed by the Senate for the Bureau of Construction and Repair instead of $15,514,000 as proposed by the House; appropriates $30,260,000 as proposed by the Senate for the Bureau of Ordnance instead of $31,060,000 as proposed by the House; makes provision, as proposed by the Senate, in the appropriation "Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks" for the purchase of four motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles at a cost not to exceed $600 each; and appropriates $28,661,000 as proposed by the Senate instead of $34,736,000 as proposed by the House for the Bureau of Aeronautics.

On Nos. 15 to 19, inclusive, relating to the Coast Guard: Appropriates $43,701 as proposed by the Senate instead of $45,990 as proposed by the House for salaries in the Commandant's Office; appropriates $2,263,000 as proposed by the Senate instead of $2,288,000 as proposed by the House for pay and allowances; appropriates $250,000 as proposed by the Senate instead of $300,000 as proposed by the House for fuel and water; and appropriates $768,188 for outfits, instead of $836,375 as proposed by the House and $700,000 as proposed by the Senate.

On Nos. 20 and 21: Inserts the paragraph proposed by the Senate authorizing not to exceed $11,000,000 of the funds appropriated for parity payments for the fiscal year 1940 to be used for the purpose of making payments (parity payments) under the Price Adjustment Act of 1938. In approving this provision the conferees expect that the sum remaining to the Department of Agriculture in the 1940 appropriation, after the use of the $11,000,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary to care for the shortage anticipated in the 1939 appropriation for parity payments, will be so administered that it will be sufficient to cover all parity-payment operations for the crop year for which the 1940 appropriation was intended.

The committee of conference report in disagreement the following amendments:

On No. 2: Permitting the War Department, in connection with the appropriation in the bill for field exercises of the Army, to make advance payments for the rental of land or the purchase of options to rent lands.

On No. 9: Permitting Col. Philip B. Fleming, a commissioned officer on the active list of the United States Army, to hold the Office of Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor.

LOUIS LUDLOW,
EMMET O'NEAL,
GEO. W. JOHNSON,
JOHN TABER,
R. B. WIGGLESWORTH,
W. P. LAMBERTSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the conference report is a complete report with the exception of two amendments that have to be voted on because they contain legislation, but about which I do not believe there is any serious controversy. The total amount of the bill as it passed the Senate was $251,822,588. The conference report as it stands and as it will become law if approved by the House is $19,658,747 below Budget estimates, the principal reductions being made in some curtailments of the maneuvers of the Army and of the Navy and the Coast Guard.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, there is anything of a controversial nature in this report. Unless someone wishes to ask me a question, I shall yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMASON. What land purchases are now left in the bill?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The purchase of some land in Puerto Rico for a depot and barracks.

Mr. TABER. There is also one in Idaho.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. One in Idaho; yes.

Mr. THOMASON. What about the item that was in the bill as it passed the House about the purchase of some land I believe in the Mojave Desert?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. There was nothing in the bill of that kind, I may say to the gentleman, that I know of; not in this bill.

Mr. THOMASON. My recollection is that there was something about the purchase of some land in the Mojave Desert for antiaircraft practice. I believe the gentleman will find something in the bill of that character. It was some very cheap land in California adjoining some public land.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I will check up on it.

Mr. THOMASON. I was curious about what happened to that item. I am interested in the policy of the committee regarding the purchase of more land at some of our more important posts.

Mr. O'NEAL. If the gentleman will yield, there were only two such provisions—for McChord Field, Wash., $200,000, and Hamilton Field, Calif., $150,000. That is all that was in the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. That is all that was in the bill. There were some other items that were discussed before the committee but were not brought in by the committee.

Mr. THOMASON. Perhaps I am mistaken, but I thought the bill included the purchase of land in the Mojave Desert in connection with some of the antiaircraft activities in California. Some more land is much needed adjoining Fort Bliss. The War Department has urged its purchase. I hope the Appropriations Committee will soon give it favorable consideration.

Mr. TABER. That might be the Mojave Desert; I do not know.

Mr. THOMASON. This may be in connection with the Hamilton Field purchase, however.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. It may be.

Mr. THOMASON. If the gentleman will yield further, will the gentleman give us a little more detail about amendment No. 2, permitting the War Department, in connection with the appropriation in the bill for field exercises of the Army, to make advance payments for the rental of land or the purchase of options to rent land?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. As I recall, they stated that their maneuvers would be very much facilitated if they could go in and make small advance payments of that character.

Mr. THOMASON. They are not permitted under the law now to buy options for the rental of land?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. They are not. They have frequently found themselves in a hole on account of not being able to deal with landowners.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. What is the total amount recommended in the conference report as compared with the amount in the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. It is $12,270,000 less than the amount in the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Do I correctly understand that the Senate actually reduced the total amount below the total as passed by the House?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Is not this about the first reduction we have had in an appropriation bill that has gone to the Senate and come back to the House for about 5 or 6 years?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I may say to the gentleman there is every evidence of the fact that Congress is going to curtail public expenditures.

Mr. RICH. We congratulate the Senate on that procedure.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The gentleman will realize, of course, that this is very early in the session. We must not start congratulating too soon.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, as I am sure the gentleman from Virginia is pleased, at the reductions the Senate has made in this bill.

Mr. MAY. Surprised, the gentleman means, perhaps.

Mr. TABER. I do not know whether I am surprised or not. I believe the Senate has begun to hear from the country and is beginning to realize, just as more of the Members of the House are beginning to realize, that the ruthless expenditure of the people's money is not as popular with the people as they thought it was a year or two ago. I believe this is the reason we are getting proper results out of the Senate.

I now want to talk for just a minute about amendments 20 and 21. These two amendments provide for a transfer out of the 1940 fund for parity payments to the 1939 funds for parity payments to cover a deficit of $11,000,000 which the Secretary of Agriculture, as I understand it, illegally incurred in the 1939 funds by promising to pay to the farmers $11,000,000 more than was appropriated to them for parity payments. This reduces the amount that will be available for parity payments in the crop that is either now planted or will be planted this spring.

We have made a statement in our report about that, and I am going to read it, because I want to call attention to it a little more emphatically than just a reading of the report in the RECORD would accomplish.

> We anticipate that the appropriation for 1940 will be so administered that it will be sufficient to cover all parity-payment operations for the crop year for which the 1940 appropriation was intended.

It is a dangerous thing for a department to incur a deficiency. It puts the Congress and the department in an untenable position, and greater care must be exercised by the departments to avoid this kind of a situation. We are having more than double the amount of deficiency estimates that we ought to have, and I hope that there will be greater care on the part of the departments in keeping their operations down to what the Congress has provided. This will result in avoiding a great many more of these deficiency items in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 2: Page 4, line 9, strike out the word "units" and the comma and insert "units; for rental of land or purchase of options to rent land without reference to section 3648 of the Revised Statutes; for the use or repair of private property."

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

Page 14, line 16, insert a new section, as follows:
"SEC. 3. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1222 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 576), Philip B. Fleming, a commissioned officer on the active list, United States Army, is authorized to hold the office of Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division in the Department of Labor without loss of or prejudice to his status as a commissioned officer on the active list of the United States Army, and if appointed to such civil office he shall receive in addition to his pay and allowances as such commissioned officer an amount equal to the difference between such pay and allowances as such commissioned officer and the salary prescribed by law for such civil office."

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia, a motion to reconsider the votes by which action was taken on the several motions, was laid on the table.

DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES FOR PUERTO RICO

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 4532) to make effective in the District of Court of the United States for Puerto Rico rules promulgated by the Supreme Court of the United States governing pleading, practice, and procedure in the district courts of the United States, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

"SEC. 2. This act shall become effective March 1, 1940."

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief article from the Maritime Exchange Bulletin.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include a radio address of Howard Hunter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAVENS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD; also, another request, to revise and extend my own remarks and include an editorial from the Times-Record of Fort Smith, Ark., dealing with the question of electric cooperative associations in Arkansas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include an editorial by Kenneth A. Reid, the conservation director of the Izaak Walton League.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MIMEOGRAPHED PUBLICATIONS BY LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I do this to call the attention of the House to the mimeographed sheets published by the Library of Congress called The Day in Congress. It purports to give the summary of the matters that happen in the Senate and in the House, calling attention to the bills, and so forth, that have been introduced. If there is anything that is pure duplication and a waste of Government money, this is it. If the Printing Committee had power to stop this, I am sure it would do so; but some other service of the Government, it seems to me, ought to take recognition of this fact and stop a great many of these mimeographed publications that are coming not only from the Library of Congress but from other departments and branches of the Government. They are worthless expenditures of the taxpayers' money. It seems to me that the executive branch of the Government or some other branch ought to take some recognition of these facts and stop the waste and extravagance that is going on in the departments of government. Mr. Speaker, where are you going to get the money for such extravagance? Who pays the bills? The American taxpayer is just about tired of useless extravagances of administration and of useless publications. Let us stop it.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I find myself in full agreement with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] as to the advisability of discontinuing this publication. The clerk of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, of which I am chairman, called this matter to my attention the other day, and also advised me a man had called at the office and said that it would be possible to have 50 or 100 copies of the mimeographed sheets sent to my constituents, if I so desired. It seems that this individual was going from door to door, soliciting names for a mailing list.

While the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments has no jurisdiction over the Library of Congress, nevertheless, I called up the Librarian and told him that I thought this was a waste of public funds, and if every Member of Congress accepted 100 copies for his or her constituents it would mean 50,000 copies a day. Like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I think that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is sufficient. This digest is not necessary. It is brief; it does not go into details of what Congress is doing as much as does the Journal. The Librarian of Congress promised me that he would look into the matter thoroughly, and he also stated he never heard that any official or employee of the Library was visiting the offices of Members. The Librarian made it plain he did not approve of an employee or official soliciting names for mailing lists, and I am positive that will be discontinued at once.

If this digest is to be continued, it will require funds for personnel, paper, and ink, as well as be an additional charge against the Government for franked mail. As the practice of issuing the digest has just commenced, it should be stopped in the borning, and I hope the Librarian will discontinue it.

AMERICAN YOUTH CONGRESS

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute, and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I was amazed, chagrined, and embarrassed yesterday to find myself sitting as a Member of this body during criticism of the wife of the President. This attack was based upon a news story appearing in the morning paper. I could scarcely refrain from making an immediate reply, but it appeared to me that I might better serve the cause of good government and tolerance by refraining from comment until I could read the remarks of my colleague from Wisconsin. I sincerely hoped that when I saw his words in print they would seem less critical, and I am now pleased to find that it might have been the manner rather than the matter which so distressed me. I must, however, say clearly that a wrong interpretation of events was given, and facts were not correctly stated.

I greatly regret this criticism, because I believe Mrs. Roosevelt is entirely devoted to the public good. I also believe that she has the balance and judgment which would have made it impossible for her to advise young people to do anything contrary to the highest principles of citizenship. I am, however, replying to the statement of my colleague, not only because of my great admiration for the character, ability, and self-sacrificing activity of Mrs. Roosevelt, but also because I was present at the White House meeting between Members of Congress and the representatives of the American Youth Congress. I understood that there were no reporters present, so I was astonished at the report in the press which purported to quote verbatim at least one member of the conference. I assume that the person who gave out the proceedings relied entirely upon his memory and will now most certainly assume full responsibility for any misunderstanding which may arise. If he does so, Mrs. Roosevelt will be entirely exonerated and acquitted of making any remarks commendatory of communism or of the Communist organization. Not one word in support of communism was spoken by anyone at that meeting.

Since I accepted the invitation to attend the White House conference, I do not feel at liberty to act as its reporter, nor do I seek the type of publicity which follows upon any such statement. I do desire, in the interests of tolerance and for the protection of youth, as well as to correct any implied injustice to a great citizen, to make some remarks about the situation which occasioned the outburst and the press report.

Why all this pother? No one claims that the American Youth Congress is a communistic organization nor Communist-controlled. Its purposes and objectives are apparently quite otherwise, and its record is entirely open for consideration by the public. The question of communism arose only in discussion of the expediency of expelling or retaining within the membership of the congress one affiliated group of young Communists. The officers of the congress wisely sought counsel on this matter. No one told them what to do. Their friends were concerned only to study all phases of the problem and to help to clarify it by suggestion and discussion. Certainly, Mrs. Roosevelt appeared to be motivated solely by the desire to have Members of Congress express themselves fully for the benefit of the young people. There was no debate on the merits or demerits of communism. That charge is only a peg on which to hang unfair attacks.

Far more important than any discussion of communism is that youth and age find it possible to work together with tolerance and forbearance. I imagine that any shortcomings among neglected youth may be directly chargeable to the break-down of our economic system. I also think the Communist group might be perfectly willing to pull out and shift for themselves. Is it not better for them and for us all that the Youth Congress should not advocate expulsion and raise barriers against opinions held by idealistic youth? We all know what age and experience does to mellow men and, alas, often to destroy youthful illusions. Why not trust to "the universal solvent of time" and to happier circumstances to form their minds into different molds?

Through the ages the Christian church has sought to gather in the sinners—never to cast them out. Those who think communism a sin and a menace should strive to dispel it rather than strengthen it by the persecution which unites with bonds stronger than steel. The magic of "together" and the gospel of sharing will accomplish wonders. Those in this Congress know it is not the American way to herd dissenters into concentration camps—the next step after casting them out.

My only suggestion to the officers of the Youth Congress was that they satisfy themselves that the young Communist group is really American in sympathy, and not controlled and directed by any government from across the seas.

Very soon most of us now in this House will be out of the picture. Another generation will be in these places formulating policies for our national life. I pray they may find a way for fuller participation for all in the marvelous opportunity and abundance enjoyed now by the privileged few. I pray that we may now and always be so tolerant and so wise that they will look back upon us as builders of a better society. I pray that we and they may never fear to pioneer on new economic and political frontiers made safe by the solid back country of our forefathers.

> For them the shade of trees that now we plant,
> The safe, smooth journey and the final goal.
> And yet the road is ours as never theirs!
> Is not one joy on us alone bestowed?
> For us the master joy, O pioneers—
> We shall not travel, but we make the road.

I am deeply sympathetic with youth today coming to earning age in a jobless society. I do not wonder that they meet in congresses. May success crown their efforts to make conditions more satisfactory. Their elders have done little enough in the 10 years since the break came. No one has been more helpful and kindly to the many needing sympathy and guidance than has our President's wife. I am thankful that there is an American Youth Congress preparing for the responsible duties of citizenship. I wish to put no obstacles in their way. It is not so important what we think of them. I just wonder what they think of us as they look about a world in ruins—two-thirds of all the people involved in war, and here in peaceful America millions hungry, miserable and hopeless. Other millions of people in lands across the seas who formerly lived under liberal governments, where they had determining voices in public affairs, have accepted totalitarian governments as a possible relief for misery in lieu of continued privation. Just what kind of an accounting can we give of our stewardship?

We cannot perpetuate our prejudices; only the people can change the Constitution. We can, however, correct some of our mistakes. I would certainly be surprised to learn that there is any general agreement that this body, or even the Senate, is always right—away wise. I have never encountered anyone who harbored such a sentiment. Let us then allow our successors a few marks below passing grade, even if we feel called upon to regulate them. It seems strange that in an American Congress it should be pertinent to remind Members that our capacity to reflect, observe, and study, and to use our minds leads some to accept one political philosophy quite foreign to others. Who constituted anyone in this free system the judge of other men's opinions.

We have, indeed, fallen upon unfortunate times when political adversaries attempt to besmirch character, and the highest character at that, by using the label of "Communist." It is not new. Such damaging and dastardly attacks have undoubtedly been made feasible and popular by the conduct of some congressional investigations into un-American activities. I do not believe it is a wholesome sign of a healthy political situation when citizens besmear each other with labels intended to convey the idea that those who do not agree with one particular philosophy of government are necessarily antisocial and destructive in their attitude toward our country. I deplore the use of the demagogic trick of calling a person a Communist when it becomes impossible to present reasoned arguments against his course or opinions.

I offer no apology for the Communists; I am in no way connected with them and have no sympathy for their point of view nor for their philosophy. I believe that many who have hoped to bring about the millenium through communism have found themselves disillusioned by recent occurrences, and by the break-down of what seemed to promise a better day for the Russian peasantry which had suffered so greatly under czarism. The tragedy of life in Russia under the old system was so poignant that the new plan appealed to people throughout the world who hailed with enthusiasm and hope the advent of a new order in that country. That the promise has been unfulfilled, and the hope blighted is known to people everywhere.

Communism as a philosophy and a basis for a political party existed before Russia undertook her experiment. Before the application of communism to government in Russia, we generally thought of it as "the belief in the desirability of social control of material life, including the social ownership of property." Those adhering to the doctrine gradually came to advocate the complete overthrow of capitalism.

People of these United States have prospered greatly under the capitalistic system. Some of those who have not enjoyed that prosperity, and some students of our economic and political history, have now come to question whether the capitalistic system can endure because of the terrific strain which has been put upon it during the past few years. Such strain is usually the outcome of war or other calamity, and under it people of European nations have surrendered rights and privileges which seem to our people essential to any good government.

Here in America, a new land fortunately free from many of the traditions and economic uncertainties of the Old World, the constant effort of our Congress has been to stabilize and preserve the capitalistic system. My colleagues on this floor all realize that we have not succeeded entirely and that it will require a tremendous and long-sustained effort to recapture the happy circumstances under which we spent our youth when we looked forward with certainty and assurance to business and professional activities. We have millions of people without jobs. They tell us that out of these twelve or thirteen millions of unemployed there are six or seven millions of young people for whom the immediate outlook is difficult if not hopeless. Very naturally those foreign agents who would destroy confidence in our ability to right our economic order have gained the attention of this jobless group. Some of them have been led to believe that another system would offer more opportunity. I am not able to learn that there are large numbers among us who have embraced the communistic theory.

The Communists, as a political party, are, under our laws, entitled to place candidates for public office on the ballot. Just recently citizens of New York have been given an opportunity to express themselves on a Communist candidate for Congress. The returns on that election do not seem to indicate that there is any danger that the people of New York City will seek the Communist solution for their problems. It is not a crime to be a Communist; they are explicitly recognized as one of the political parties entitled to candidates and appeal for support under our system of government. Even our civil service cannot legally ban Communists from Government employment. I quote from a recent press statement credited to a Government official:

> We have been advised with regard to Communists that unless we could find something other than their communistic beliefs or tendencies, we must accept them.

To me it seems preposterous that in a country like ours, where there is free speech and general ownership of property, communism could really take root. It is, however, an era of fear and name-calling. So the label of "Communist" has become almost the worst which could be attached to any person in our society. As we seek to strengthen our Republic we need most to fear all the manifestations of lack of integrity among our people; the willingness to surrender free institutions for bread; and the greed which reaches out to corrupt and control government in Nation, in States, and their political units. Yes, I fear fascism, nazi-ism, and political corruption just as I fear and deplore communism; all are un-American. I believe the best preventive to be economic justice and decency in public life.

My impression, from listening to the discussion between the young people and the Congressmen, was that it was suggested that the one group of Communists affiliated with the American Youth Congress might possibly be greatly benefited by the attitude and activities of that organization of young people, and that it might be better for us all if they were not made outcasts because of political belief; better if they were not made bitter and resentful, as they would probably be if they were not allowed to continue their association with young people of other aims and devoted to other methods of reaching the goal of human happiness through government. I heard these young people who were arranging the citizenship conference argue brilliantly, forcefully, and effectively for their program. I later heard it suggested by responsible citizens that, as long as the Communist Party is a legally recognized party entitled to a place on the ballot and to seats in this Congress, it might be too much to expect that a group of young people should initiate the movement to outlaw the Communist Party from membership in an association of young people. How can any man who has not proposed an amendment to the Constitution excluding Communists from the ballot and from the floor of this House call upon young people to ban into the wilderness of resentment this group of their associates who are guilty of no crime under our statutes?

It seems to me that if this larger youth group can shed sweetness and light upon those who are so greatly feared by some Members of this House, it will be better to allow them to do so. Dissenters are always a challenge to the majority in any group; association with other young thinkers may gradually dissolve communistic tendencies of malcontents. No one seems to have the slightest fear that the Communists would dominate the American Youth Congress. It is a minor matter, and is not, I think, considered of paramount importance to those who are interested in the welfare of the young people or in the welfare of the country. The very fact that Congressmen were called in to advise these young people indicates that there is nothing to fear, that they are willing to conduct their organization in the full light of day, and that they desire public approval and cooperation.

I believe that age has a duty to youth, and I believe the Members of this House have it within their hands to stay the march of any evil forces which are threatening our body politic. I do not believe it should be left entirely to young people to accomplish this. I do not believe that the cure of our evils lies in the restriction of civil and political liberties nor in the suppression of free speech. Our young people have a just grievance against our economic system because they are jobless. If they are willing to work with us and we are willing to work with them we may arrive at a solution of our most serious problem—unemployment.

Heaven help our country if it ever becomes a crime to hold any particular political or religious belief or opinions. It used to be our habit to accept lightly the mention of communism; our inherent beliefs had not then been shaken by disturbing economic changes. For years the press of this country mentioned in slightly debunking terms the 5-year plan in Russia. Now the tragic results in Russia and the discontent and unrest following continued unemployment here combine to make us more fearful of some of the suggested political remedies for our economic disease. This is an age of enlightenment in which intelligent leaders seek to be fully informed on matters affecting human relationships. It would seem a sad commentary on our civilization to have logic and reason abandoned and an alarmist campaign against one small political group substituted for orderly processes.

I have, during all my mature life, been connected with young people, first as a teacher, and for many years as a member of the Board of Regents in my home State. I am interested in trying to help them. I do not consider it helpful to have their opinions attacked and flaunted on the floor of this House. I believe there should be tolerance of youthful ideologies. It is my understanding that the aims of the Youth Congress are generally commendable. Let us help them by wise counsel; let us not embitter them by attacking them, even when they are mistaken. Let us give them an example and engender faith in our American institutions. Let us retain their confidence in legislative bodies and in democratic processes.

I commend to the attention of those who are so scornful of youth a most beautiful essay by Robert Louis Stevenson, The Lantern Bearers. In that essay he tells about the boys in an English village who, following the traditions of their forbears, went out on a certain night each year with lighted lanterns buckled around their waists. Over each lighted lantern there was tightly buttoned a topcoat concealing the bull's-eye from the public. These boys, upon meeting each other, inquired,

"Have you got your lantern?" No one pretended to know what the other one was carrying until the coat was unbuttoned and the bull's-eye disclosed. These boys gathered together in abandoned boats and there discussed the problems of man and nature. Stevenson says of them:

> The essence of this bliss was to walk by yourself in the black night; the slide shut, the topcoat buttoned; not a ray escaping, whether to conduct your footsteps or to make your glory public; a mere pillar of darkness in the dark; and all the while, deep down in the privacy of your fool's heart, to know you had a bull's-eye at your belt, and to exult and sing over the knowledge.

Now, I take it that these young people who have sacrificed so much for their organization, the American Youth Congress, have a golden chamber at the heart of it, and there they dwell delighted, and dark as their pathway may seem to the observer, each has a bull's-eye at his belt. I rejoice that they have cherished purposes, and I rejoice that they are eager to share their ideas with those less fortunate, and, possibly, less stable in their political judgments.

Stevenson says:

> There is one fable that touches very near to the quick of life. The fable of the monk who passed into the woods, heard a bird break into song; hearkened for a trill or two, and found himself on his return a stranger at his convent gates.

I believe the young Communists, joining with the American Youth Congress, will hear that song, will see that light, and will return finding themselves strangers to any system contrary to American ideals.

TRANSFER OF PARITY FUNDS

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that the criticism of the Secretary of Agriculture and the Department of Agriculture by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] in connection with the transfer of parity funds is at all justified. A few moments ago he took them to task for permitting what he termed a deficit of $11,000,000 in the 1939 parity funds. What are the facts?

In 1938 this Congress appropriated $212,000,000 for parity payments in 1939 to the producers of the five basic crops—cotton, corn, wheat, rice, and tobacco. These payments could be made only to those producers who cooperated in the 1939 farm program. As the parity payments to wheat producers are made in the spring of the year, it is always necessary for the Secretary of Agriculture to calculate the amount of money to be allotted to each of these crops and the payment to be made to each producer in the early part of the year. For instance, last year the Department began making parity payments to the winter-wheat producers on March 27, 1939. As an estimate must be set up for each crop before payments can be made to any producers, it was therefore necessary for the Secretary of Agriculture to determine as best he could before these wheat payments were made the amount of money to be allotted to each of the aforementioned crops and the individual payments to be made. I understand that his calculations were made and completed on February 14, 1939. You will readily see that this was long before any cotton, corn, or tobacco had even been planted.

Therefore the calculations made by the Secretary can be nothing more than his best estimate, based upon past experience. The reason why there is a shortage of funds for 1939 is because the compliance by the farmers with the program in 1939 was much greater than it had ever been before, and therefore the past experience was not an accurate factor. For instance, in setting up his estimates, the Secretary estimated that 73½ percent of the corn producers would cooperate in the program, but after the crop had been planted and checked it was found that 79 percent of the producers had cooperated in the program. Likewise, on the basis of past years, the Secretary estimated that 86 percent of the cotton producers would cooperate in the program, but when their crops were checked in June and July, and some as late as August, it was found that 96 percent of the cotton producers had cooperated in the program.

At that time the wheat farmers had already received their parity money and definite promises had been made to the cotton and corn producers, and it was impossible to change the calculation.

In order that you might determine the fairness of the criticism of the gentleman from New York, I wish to call your attention to the fact that I never heard one word of praise from him of the Department of Agriculture in the past years when the Secretary overestimated the amount needed and turned back into the Treasury nearly 20 times as much as the present shortage. In 1935 Congress appropriated $43,000,000 for cotton price-adjustment payments, and of that sum only $39,751,000 was paid out and $3,249,000 was turned back into the Treasury. In 1937, $130,000,000 was appropriated for cotton price-adjustment payments, of which only $122,151,000 was paid out and $7,849,000 was turned back into the Treasury. In 1936, $440,000,000 was appropriated for soil-conservation payments, of which only $393,500,000 was paid out and $46,500,000 was turned back into the Treasury. In 1937, $500,000,000 was appropriated for soil-conservation payments, of which only $360,000,000 was paid to the farmers and $140,000,000 left in the Treasury. This shows that for the 3 years—1935, 1936, and 1937—a total of $197,598,000 which had been appropriated for benefit and parity payments to the farmers, but was not received by them, was retained in the United States Treasury. Certainly it is not becoming of anyone to criticize the present shortage of around $11,000,000 in view of the enormous amount of overage in past years.

I call your attention to the fact that this is not an appropriation of $11,000,000; it does not call for one extra penny out of the United States Treasury, but simply provides that of the $225,000,000 appropriated for parity payments in 1940, $11,000,000 may be used to complete the payments for 1939.

This $11,000,000 is not to go to any particular State or to any particular section. The shortage exists in 42 of the 48 States, and I call your attention to the fact that the greatest amount of shortage is in the State of Illinois, amounting to $1,284,000.

Here is the list of the States and the amount needed to complete the payments in each State:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE CATTLE AND DAIRY INDUSTRY OF THE NORTH

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in defense of the cattle and dairy industry of the North and of the sturdy Americans who live in that territory.

Yesterday at the other end of the Capitol, the senior Senator from South Carolina made a sharp and vigorous charge against the people in that district. Among other things he said:

> You have tried to keep us from going into the cattle business, but I invite you to come up into our section and see what we are doing. Up in your God-forsaken part of the country you have to protect your cows and feed them for about 6 months of the year.

The Senator further said:

> I am speaking of all of that section south of the Mason-Dixon line and not of the section up in the frozen, God-forsaken part of the country above us where there is from 6 to 8 months of ungodly cold weather, where people shiver and have to take from us in order to live at all. If it had not been for the protective tariff, that would have been, if not a wilderness, at least a semiwilderness and a semidesert.

Now, that sort of argument may sound all right down in the State from which the Senator comes, but it does not sound good in Nebraska. I am informed by the United States Statistical Record that, according to the last census, the Senator's State had an illiteracy rate of 14.9 percent of children of 10 years of age and over, while in the State of Nebraska we have the lowest of all the States of 1.2 percent. This low rate of illiteracy may be one of the reasons why the people of Nebraska raise good cattle and know good beefsteak and know the value and true worth of the fine, pure dairy products that come from the great northern States.

It may also have a bearing on why the Senator from South Carolina voted against the great cattle and dairy industries of our country when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was passed in the year 1934. And why that same Senator yesterday voted in favor of an amendment which would permit the use of butter substitutes and oleomargarine in our veterans' hospitals.

I want to say to this Congress and to the whole world that if they want to get a glimpse of the more abundant life, which the New Deal promised us and we did not get, just set yourselves down before a good, choice, prime Nebraska beefsteak and enjoy it.

By what token or right does the Senator from South Carolina have to say that the people from the North have to take from them in order to live at all? The fact is that the payments from the United States Treasury constitute 18 percent of the total farm income of the Senator's State, which is a much greater percentage than the great territory about which he speaks.

The Senator concludes his speech by talking about patriots. The Senator knows what the violation of the two-term precedent would mean to the very foundations of our Republic. He knows that such a thing is un-American and out of place in our scheme of things, yet I challenge him to carry his State for the opposition party when that crucial test comes up next November. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include excerpts from a paper entitled "Action."

AMERICAN YOUTH CONGRESS

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I feel constrained to say just a word in response to the remarks of my beloved friend the gentleman from Oregon, Governor PIERCE.

The Washington press carried stories recently in reference to the White House conference on activities of the American Youth Congress, which was held at the invitation of Mrs. Roosevelt.

It is interesting to note that 27 Democratic Members of the House were invited to attend this conference. It is exceedingly interesting to note that of the 27 House Members invited, 16 of the 21 Members who voted against the resolution continuing the Dies committee were invited. Of the remaining 11, 2 were members of the Dies committee, namely, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Representative CASEY, and the gentleman from California, Representative VOORHIS. Of the remaining 9, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Representative SACKS, was listed as an invitee, but he was not recorded as voting on the Dies resolution. The remaining 8 were the majority leader, Mr. RAYBURN, the gentleman from Kansas, Representative HOUSTON, the gentleman from Oklahoma, Representative ROGERS, the gentleman from Georgia, Representative TARVER, the gentleman from West Virginia, Representative JOHNSON, the gentleman from Alabama, Representative PATRICK, the gentlewoman from New Jersey, Representative NORTON, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Representative EBERHARTER.

It was indeed proper that the gentleman from Texas, Mr. RAYBURN, be invited and I can suspect that the reason my colleague the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. HOUSTON, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. TARVER, were invited was because they are members of the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee in charge of N. Y. A. and C. C. C. appropriations. I can also understand why the gentleman from Oklahoma, Representative Rogers, was invited, as he has been an outspoken friend of the N. Y. A. and the National Youth movement. The gentleman from West Virginia, Representative JOHNSON, is a member of the Appropriations Committee.

This leaves three Members unaccounted for, namely the gentlewoman from New Jersey, Mrs. NORTON, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. PATRICK, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. EBERHARTER. At least one of these three does not understand himself how he got to be invited.

I believe it is to the everlasting credit of the Senators and Representatives who were invited to this meeting that, with the exception of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], those who did express themselves at this meeting, I know authoritatively, went on record definitely against the infiltration of the Young Communist League into the American Youth Congress.

I regret that the newspapers carry the story that the First Lady of the land defends the rights of Communists in the American Youth Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. SACKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SACKS. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy that my friend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] told the Members of this House that I was invited to go to that conference. It seems to me that the youth of this country are very much interested in our Government and very much interested in the future of democracy. I am also sure that the youth of this Nation are not communistic. I am sure I am not communistic. I am happy to be invited to go to the White House. I accept very graciously the fact that I was invited and I am sure that if the gentleman from Wisconsin had been invited himself by a Republican President or President's wife, he would have been happy to go to the White House.

The American youth are most desirous that their views be communicated to our legislative body. To me this is a most worthy project. The First Lady has most sympathetically undertaken to help the vast group of American youth who tomorrow will be the backbone of American democracy and the continuance of democratic principles established by our forefathers. I rise to protest any inference as to her motives and feel secure the American public understand her great desire to help youth. In my opinion this is Americanism and am proud to be one of her guests in this demonstration. The inclusion in this list of such stalwart Americans as the distinguished majority leader, Mr. RAYBURN, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CASEY, and the gentleman from California, Mr. VOORHIS, makes my position all the more preferable. Therefore, I add my humble thanks to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] for his statement. However, the gentleman from Wisconsin is following in the footsteps of his leader, John Hamilton, National Republican Chairman, who refused the invitation to have the Republican Party represented at this meeting with the representatives of 4,000,000 youths of this country who are honestly seeking advice and guidance. Mr. Speaker, I resent the implication on the part of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the youth of America are communistic. The refusal of the Republican Party to cooperate with the youth of America cannot be covered up by raising the false cry of communism.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

STATE, COMMERCE, JUSTICE, AND THE JUDICIARY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8319, making appropriations for the Departments of State, Commerce, and Justice, and for the judiciary, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8319, with Mr. BEAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent expenses: For stationery, furniture and repairs, floor coverings, file holders and cases; miscellaneous expenditures, including telegraphing and telephones, and teletype rentals and tolls, postage, labor, typewritters and adding machines and the exchange thereof and repairs thereto, streetcar fares, newspapers not exceeding $350, press clippings, and other necessaries ordered by the Attorney General; official transportation, including the repair, maintenance, and operation of four motor-driven passenger cars (one for the Attorney General and three for general use of the Department), delivery trucks, and motorcycle, to be used only for official purposes; purchase of lawbooks, books of reference, and periodicals, including the exchange thereof; examination of estimates of appropriation in the field; and miscellaneous and emergency expenses authorized and approved by the Attorney General, to be expended at his discretion, $175,000: Provided, That not to exceed $2 per volume shall be paid for the current and future volumes of the United States Code, Annotated.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, there has been considerable confusion regarding the act making compulsory the reply to questions that will be asked by the enumerators in connection with the gathering of the sixteenth decennial census. It has come to my attention that some of this confusion is the result of an erroneous newspaper article which appeared in one of the New York papers recently.

The fact of the matter is that all of the questions in connection with this census gathering must be answered under the law of June 18, 1929, providing for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses of the United States (46 Stat. 21; U. S. C. supp. VII, title 13, ch. 4). This act provides that all persons over 18 years of age shall answer correctly and to the best of their knowledge all questions on the census schedules applying to themselves, to their families, and to their farm.

The act provides a penalty of not to exceed $100 if a person is guilty of refusing to answer the official questions on the schedules for census of population, the census of agriculture, and the census of housing.

At its first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, the Congress passed a special act to provide for a national census of housing (Public, No. 385, ch. 688, 1st sess., 76th Cong.). This act has the effect of adding as a subject in the Sixteenth Census, which will be taken this year, a census of housing.

Along with other Members of Congress, I have been receiving letters from my constituents indicating that there has been given the impression through some publications or through verbal information in some cases that it is not compulsory to reply to these questions. So far as I am concerned, I am notifying all my constituents of the true facts, which are that every official question asked by the enumerators when they call must be replied to under the penalty provided in the law, which is a fine of not to exceed $100 or imprisonment not to exceed 60 days, or both; and I wish to warn them not to give false answers, because there is a fine of not to exceed $500 or imprisonment not to exceed 1 year, or both.

The misleading newspaper article to which I referred previously appeared in the Sunday New York Times early in January. This article stated in brackets that "reporting on census questionnaire was not compulsory." It was retracted by the Times the next day, and a statement has been issued by Director W. L. Austin, Bureau of the Census, fully explaining the duties of citizens to report in this census.

I fear that the newspaper article has misled many people into believing that some questions need not be answered, so I take this opportunity to warn all Members of the House, when they receive letters from constituents, to advise them that it is absolutely compulsory to answer all questions pertaining to this census, as required by an act of Congress in 1929.

There may have been other misunderstandings concerning compulsion and noncompulsion in the gathering of the current information on the part of the Department of Commerce, and this matter should be explained to Members of the House, who may find this information valuable when they are asked these questions by their constituents. The Department of Commerce, through the Bureau of the Census, gathers monthly statistics by mail from business and industrial concerns which voluntarily report their sales, stocks, and production of certain commodities to the Department of Commerce. These statistics are gathered under the general authority of the act establishing the Department of Commerce, and should not be confused with censuses, the reporting of which is required by law.

Some of these monthly questionnaires, however, are specifically provided for by acts of Congress. For instance, the schedules on cotton, cottonseed, and red-cedar shingles.

So far as I am able to learn at this particular time, these are the only three subjects which the law specifies must be replied to, except those subjects specified in the Decennial Census Act and by the act providing for a permanent Census Office—United States Code, Supplement 7, title 13. The general monthly compilations on the part of the Department of Commerce are voluntary. These minor reports may have caused the confusion in some of the statements that have been made; I refer to the false statement that it is not compulsory to reply to some of the questions asked in the decennial census.

There appears on the face of every official census questionnaire taken under authority of the Decennial Census Act and other acts, which specifically provide for compulsory reporting on the questions asked, the following explanation:

Your report is required by act of Congress. This act also makes it unlawful for the Bureau to disclose any facts, including names or identity, from your census reports. Only sworn census employees will see your statements. Data collected will be used solely for preparing statistical information concerning the Nation's population, resources, and business activities. Your census report cannot be used for purposes of taxation, regulation, or investigation.

In connection with the industrial and business censuses the penalty is more severe than for refusal to give information on population, housing, or agriculture. I wish to quote from the act of June 18, 1929, section 10, as follows:

That it shall be the duty of every owner, official, agent, person in charge, or assistant to the person in charge of any company, business, institution, establishment, religious body, or organization of any nature whatsoever to answer completely and correctly to the best of his knowledge all questions relating to his respective company, business, institution, establishment, religious body, or other organization, or to records or statistics in his official custody, contained on any census schedule prepared by the Director of the Census under the authority of this act, or of the act to provide for a permanent census office, approved March 6, 1902, or of acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto; and any person violating the provisions of this section by refusing or willfully neglecting to answer any of said questions shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $500 or imprisonment for a period not exceeding 60 days, or both so fined and imprisoned; and any person violating the provisions of this section by willfully giving answers that are false shall be fined not exceeding $10,000 or imprisoned for a period not exceeding 1 year, or both.

Considerable has been said about the possible danger of revelation of information which is to be secured by the enumerators. In fact, everyone connected with the Department of Commerce, from the Director down, is sworn to protect census information against disclosure. In order to bring to your attention the penalty for such revelation of confidential information, I quote from the act of June 18, 1929, section 8, which provides strict penalty for this violation of confidence:

That any supervisor, supervisor's clerk, enumerator, interpreter, special agent, or other employees who, having taken and subscribed the oath of office, shall without justifiable cause, neglect or refuse to perform the duties enjoined on him by this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $500; or if he shall, without the authority of the Director of the Census, publish or communicate any information coming into his possession by reason of his employment under the provision of this act, or the act to provide for a permanent census office, or acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, he shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not to exceed $1,000 or be imprisoned not to exceed 2 years, or both so fined and imprisoned in the discretion of the court.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of antitrust and kindred laws: For the enforcement of antitrust and kindred laws, including experts at such rates of compensation as may be authorized or approved by the Attorney General, except that the compensation paid to any person employed hereunder shall not exceed the rate of $10,000 per annum, including personal services in the District of Columbia, $1,250,000.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VOORHIS of California: On page 59, line 3, after the words "District of Columbia", strike out "$1,250,000" and insert "$1,500,000."

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of raising by $250,000 the appropriation for the enforcement of the antitrust laws.

My first reason for so doing is that last year the appropriation was $1,300,000, and the work of this division of the Department of Justice has, in the course of the last few months, greatly expanded, and I think has produced some results which are of great benefit.

The second reason why I offer the amendment is because I find that during the past year, whereas $1,300,000 was appropriated for this purpose, there were collected in fines by this division or as a result of its work $2,400,000. In other words, it more than paid its own way.

Generally speaking, what I am interested in is this: I believe that for a solution of the economic problem within the framework of a free economy it is necessary to remove the obstacle which monopoly presents to free enterprise, and which monopoly inevitably brings about through taking an unjustifiable share of the national income into the hands of a comparatively few corporations, which ought to go generally throughout the business community.

We have a situation where prices of industrial goods in many instances are out of proportion to what they should be; and it is the industries where real competition exists, notably agriculture, which suffer from this situation.

If anything is consistent with a philosophy of free enterprise the work of this Division certainly is. We have at the moment the coming of the so-called war industries into the picture which, if we can read history at all, will mean a more serious situation with regard to unjustifiable prices and monopoly than would otherwise be the case. It does not seem to me that this is the time when this work ought to be curtailed—and the amount of the appropriation carried for this item in the bill will mean that it will be curtailed. My amendment would mean that it may be reasonably, though not very much, expanded; and even though my amendment were adopted, the item would still be $900,000 less than the amount of fines collected last year as a result of the work of this Division. With the expansion of its work this item of income can be expected to increase. Another result of inordinate prices for certain articles in this country, according to studies made, has been the importation of a lot of goods from abroad by mass sellers of those goods when they undoubtedly would use the American product if it were priced more properly and not under the influence of monopolistic control of price.

The work of this Division is to enforce the laws that we now have on our statute books. It seems to me this is a time when this work should continue vigorously, and this is the reason I offer this amendment.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am for the pending amendment, but I desire to say to the Committee at this time that, irrespective of the fate of this amendment, an amendment will be offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL] for the purpose of increasing this fund $100,000.

The purpose of the amendment to be proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL] is to give the Attorney General sufficient money to bring the dairy monopolists to book. It is a fact, and this Congress must know it, that the Federal Trade Commission has repeatedly found that the dairymen in America, composed of 3,500,000 people, with 10,000,000 dependents, are in the grip of a savage, unrestrained monopoly composed largely of Borden and National Dairies. The Federal Trade Commission, the greatest fact-finding body in the world, has found that unless this marketing monopoly is taken off the backs of the dairymen they will be driven from the land. Authoritative findings, particularly in the State of New York, show that these distributors are now making 107 percent on manufactured milk and 24 percent on fluid milk. The dairyman is coming into a situation where he will have no place to lay his head. Twenty years ago he was the finest type of individualist in this civilization. Today his condition is becoming comparable to that of the itinerant sharecropper of the Southwest.

Vigorous antitrust prosecution is the only thing that can save him.

Last July a nonpartisan committee composed of representatives of the dairying States called the attention of the Attorney General to this situation. The Attorney General is ready to proceed.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; I will yield, but briefly only.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I merely want to say that if this amendment is adopted it will be used also for the purpose the gentleman is bringing to our attention. I regret that I did not mention it in my remarks.

Mr. CULKIN. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, the history of appropriations of this character is that they bring a twofold return to the Treasury. That was just referred to by the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS]. So the economy program, fine as it is—and I am in strong sympathy with it—has no place here.

Permit me to say, and I think it is probably unusual on this floor to commend the opposition, that I have great respect for the achievements of Thurman Arnold, who is now in charge of the antitrust prosecutions. I regard him as one of the outstanding men of the present administration. [Applause.] From the standpoint of public usefulness, I believe he is probably the most outstanding man in the executive branch. Thurman Arnold understands this situation. We have been over it with him in detail, and he is prepared to act. Some of us who have studied this question and lived with it for years are convinced that unless this action is taken the dairymen will pass from the national picture. This, of course, would be a supreme tragedy. I urge the Members of the Committee, particularly those upon my own side of the aisle in whose districts the dairymen are largely resident, to support one or the other of these amendments.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. RABAUT. We had quite a conference about this in the committee, and I for one was very favorable toward an increase in funds for this division. We also called especial attention to it in the report. There are 50 cases now pending before the Antitrust Division, of which 20 are key cases; in other words, if these 20 cases are adjusted a great many other cases would be affected.

Mr. CULKIN. But it does not go to this question, may I say to the gentleman.

Mr. RABAUT. Just a moment. There is just so much that can be done, and there are only two places in the whole bill where we have gone above the Budget. This is one. The other was the Patent Office. So we want the gentleman to know that the committee was very favorable to this particular activity.

Mr. CULKIN. I think the committee is a splendid one.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GWYNNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GWYNNE. I simply want to say it is a very necessary appropriation and I hope the amendment will be agreed to because it is an important amendment.

Mr. CULKIN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Maybe the gentleman has a good man in mind to prosecute, but has that man the backing of this administration? The present administration has committed itself in favor of monopoly and it has never emphasized enforcing the antitrust law. It aided monopoly in the form of the N. R. A.

Mr. CULKIN. May I say in answer to the gentleman from Kansas that Thurman Arnold is giving hope to most Americans who believe that the solution of the marketing problems of the farmer, the troubles of the small industrialists, and the elimination of the racketeering laborite, is in the enforcement of the antitrust laws. Thurman Arnold has given new hope to those people. I think he has gotten off to a fine, courageous start. I know he is a sincere, able, conscientious public official.

Mr. STEFAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. I agree with what the gentleman has said. I call his attention to the fact that the committee recognized this because we increased the appropriation for Mr. Arnold's department $21,000 over the Budget estimate.

Mr. CULKIN. I understand that.

Mr. STEFAN. We did that in recognition of the service rendered by this particular bureau.

Mr. CULKIN. I am speaking for 13,000,000 people who are being destroyed and this committee has made no provision for them.

Mr. STEFAN. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. CULKIN. There are 55 cases pending. The average case costs $100,000 and unless this additional money is made available and earmarked by this discussion, these people are going to be driven off the land.

Mr. WALTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WALTER. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact this Division has saved many thousands of dollars in the purchase of automobiles through the breaking up of a combination that added many dollars to the cost of an automobile.

Mr. CULKIN. That is true. This Division has also made history in connection with the building-trades industry, where they have saved the country millions of dollars.

Mr. Chairman, if we agree to the amount proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS], and increase this appropriation $250,000, or $100,000, as the gentleman from Wisconsin would propose, it will be of great assistance. The dairy monopoly today is thwarting the law, and in the State legislatures and here in Washington they are literally spending millions of dollars to defeat the law. All we ask is a paltry $250,000, or at the will of the House, $100,000, for this purpose.

I may say to the gentlemen on this side of the aisle that antitrust enforcement is in the best Republican tradition, because the Republican Party put these antitrust laws on the books. Strange as it may seem, the best antitrust enforcement we have had down to the time of Thurman Arnold was by Mr. Wickersham, who was a Wall Street lawyer, but true to his trust.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the Members of the Committee on both sides of the aisle will stand by and aid the dairymen in their hour of need. [Applause.]

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

Mr. Chairman, I am very much in sympathy with the author of this amendment and with the gentleman who has spoken in behalf of the amendment, but permit me to say that the subcommittee gave careful consideration to every argument they have made this afternoon in behalf of the amendment increasing the appropriation by $250,000. At the present time there are 50 antitrust cases pending and they are in the process of litigation. Many of these cases are cases that will become precedents and will decide hundreds of other cases; therefore, this committee thought that by increasing the appropriation $41,000 over that allowed by the Bureau of the Budget it was treating the Antitrust Division in a most generous manner.

We are very much in sympathy with seeing this work carried on. The gentlemen who have just preceded me spoke specifically of the dairy industry. There is nothing in the amendment offered by the gentleman from California that guarantees that one cent of this money will be spent in fighting the battles of the dairy industry. On the other hand, he has no right to conclude that the money we have provided here, or at least some of it, will not be spent on behalf of the dairy industry.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. For a brief question.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman has made a statement about me and I wish to state my situation briefly. We have been in contact with the Attorney General's Office, formerly Attorney General Murphy, and with Thurman Arnold. We are convinced that they are going ahead if they get this additional money.

Mr. CARTER. We are giving them more than the Bureau of the Budget allowed.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Is it not true, however, that the appropriation provided in the bill is a cut over what they had last year of $50,000?

Mr. CARTER. That may be true. I do not recall, but I do know that in making these appropriations we cannot run wild on something in which we are particularly interested. There must be a balance in making these appropriations, and it was in the exercise of that balance that we went only $41,000 over the Bureau of the Budget.

The subcommittee listened attentively and at length to a description of the work of the Antitrust Division. We are not minimizing the beneficial results that flow from this work, but we believe that with the Federal Treasury in the condition it is at the present time, that this Antitrust Division, notwithstanding the importance of the work, should not at this time have in excess of $1,250,000 that we have given them.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL]?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I shall object unless I may have an opportunity to talk on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was on his feet and the Chair will be glad to recognize him.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak too.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be arbitrary. I would like to have 10 minutes in opposition and I am willing to allow the gentlemen in favor of the amendment 10 minutes. If there is no objection, I would like to see that agreement adopted.

Mr. CULKIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I see there are three Members who wish to speak for the amendment, which would mean 25 minutes of debate.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I modify my request and ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL].

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment. I had intended for a specific purpose to offer an amendment for an increase of $100,000 in this appropriation. The gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] was recognized, however, and his amendment is now before the Committee. I have reason to believe that if this amendment is carried and the fund is increased by $250,000, it will include the purpose of the amendment I had intended to offer.

May I state to the gentleman from California [Mr. CARTER], who has just spoken, that this increase will not be damaging to the balancing of the Budget. It is perfectly plain from the statement of Mr. Arnold before the Committee on Appropriations that about $3 is taken in in the way of fines and penalties for every dollar that is expended by the Antitrust Division. Consequently, any increase in these funds will serve to that extent in helping balance the Budget.

The particular reason for my amendment, and my interest in the pending amendment, is that nearly a year ago a delegation of Members from the dairy sections of the country, after repeated endeavors and numerous meetings, filed a complaint with the Attorney General's Department, asking that action be taken on the prosecution of the cases against the milk or dairy products monopolies. A little later we went to see Attorney General Murphy, and later Mr. Arnold. We had several conferences with them. We urged that the Chicago cases be pushed to the limit, and I would say, by the way, that they are being pushed to the limit.

They have gone to the Supreme Court, the nature of the actions has been affirmed there, and it is now back for trial in the district court at Chicago. However, the trouble we have had in obtaining action by the Department of Justice in other cases is that they have had no funds for carrying on the prosecutions.

There are five large dairy companies in the United States which control the larger part of the distribution of whole milk, and are now reaching out and obtaining control of the markets for butter, cheese, and other dairy products. These firms are very well known. Their practices have been very fully investigated and are described in the voluminous report of the Trade Commission, which found that in nearly all the large centers of this country the farmers are being discriminated against as to the prices they receive for their milk and their opportunity of selling milk, and that at the same time the consumers are compelled to pay an exorbitant price for the milk they buy.

We people who come from the dairy sections feel that this increased amount should be allowed. We believe, notwithstanding the fact that cuts have been made in other directions, that this is an outstanding incident which requires and should have the support of Congress in promoting the protection of both the farmer, who furnishes the milk, and the consumers in the large centers. Therefore, I hope this amendment will be adopted and that the additional $250,000 will be voted.

May I say, further, that I have such confidence in Mr. Arnold and his Department that in case this amendment carries, I have no doubt that a reasonable portion of the amount, $100,000, at least, will be set aside for the purpose of pursuing the investigation, obtaining evidence, and bringing indictments against more and more of these combinations in the larger centers of the country.

I hope the amendment will be adopted. There is nothing partisan about it, there is nothing extravagant about it. It is a plain common-sense proposal to allow the Department of Justice sufficient funds to bring to book these people who have robbed the consumers as well as the farmers of America of millions of dollars. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, up to this time I have voted consistently for every bill and every cut that the Committee on Appropriations has brought before this House. Let it be understood that in respect to this particular item, however, while the appropriation is ostensibly $41,000 above the Budget estimate, in fact the appropriation represents a cut of $59,000 below the appropriation for last year.

I am opposed to monopoly wherever it can be found. I am satisfied as a result of some years of intimate contact with the milk and dairy business that there is in this country a very rank monopolistic influence in that field. I am thoroughly satisfied from various contacts and conferences with Mr. Arnold that he is one man in this Government who is not politically minded, that he is endeavoring honestly to perform his job, and that if he is given the funds with which to work he will ferret out and destroy the monopolies that are so viciously assailing the interests not only of the farmers but of the consumers of this country. [Applause.]

I want the RECORD to disclose that as far as I personally am concerned I am a firm believer in the interests of economy.

However, I believe it is false economy in this case to take away from this Department funds which Mr. Arnold says are sorely and absolutely needed if he is to continue the investigation into the milk monopoly and carry it through to a successful prosecution.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. Does not the gentleman believe it would be a measure of economy, when we know that in order to help the farmers the Surplus Commodities Corporation is going into the market to buy up these surpluses, if we could relieve the farmer from the drain that is made upon him by this monopoly?

Mr. KEEFE. There is no question about it. May I say further that the Surplus Commodities Corporation, going into the market and buying surplus commodities for sometimes as low as half what it costs the farmer to produce them, is not giving a very great benefit to the farmer, but is, in effect, compelling the farmer to feed the people in the cities by letting them eat up the profits of the farm through their getting these commodities for about half what it has cost the farmer to produce them.

I support the tenor of this amendment. Whether $250,000 is the proper sum I cannot say; but I am firmly of the belief that Mr. Arnold is entitled to an increase in this appropriation, and that if he is given it he will carry out the program that he has told us he will carry out. I am satisfied that he will carry on this milk investigation and that we Members of Congress who come from the dairy States will at least have done our part in raising our voices here when the time is ripe in support of the efforts to destroy a monopoly in the milk business. [Applause.]

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I am delighted to know that my friend from Wisconsin and myself can agree upon this amendment. I rather have my doubts about the ability of the Justice Department to control the milk monopoly; however, I do want them to try. Monopoly seems to be beyond the reach of Government control. I have been in close touch with the dairy business for a great many years, dating clear back of the time when I was Governor of Oregon. I remember introducing a bill in the State legislature, a mild affair, to help the dairymen. I shall never forget the fight that was put up by the Milk Trust in opposition to that bill. I shall never forget how one of the agents of the milk combination came to me after the fight was over and said: "It does not matter what you do, all we need to do is to put on the propaganda—get control of the papers and we can win the people." The monopoly defeated our efforts at that time.

Since I have been a Member of this House I have worked with our colleagues from New York and Wisconsin, particularly those interested in the dairy industry, trying to reach some solution. I am voting for this amendment. I think it ought to be adopted. It means $100,000 that will go into the hands of the prosecuting officers to try to reach this trust or this monopoly. I am not certain it can be done. We may have to pass laws here that will compel the producers to distribute the milk themselves cooperatively. That is going to be a fierce battle because we will have to fight a great many organizations that are now living off of the farmer. If something is not done in the way of breaking up the monopolies, then peasantry for the dairyman seems a certainty.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PIERCE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman was present at the Attorney General's office with our committee and heard the discussion there, and he is satisfied that if this appropriation is increased and, in effect, earmarked by this discussion, action will be taken in this matter?

Mr. PIERCE. Absolutely. If this amendment of our colleague from California prevails, there will be a real, genuine attempt made by the legal department to help out this situation in the distribution of milk. I am for the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, as a Representative coming from the city of New York, with a population of over 7,000,000, I am deeply interested in every proposal that has for its object the reduction in the cost of living. The people of my city are vitally concerned about the cost of living and I want to do everything in my power to eliminate any unnecessary expense. If the adoption of this amendment is the method by which we can help to reduce the cost of milk and the by-products, I am heartily in favor of the amendment to provide additional funds for the Attorney General to fight alleged monopolies.

I have always admired my colleague the gentleman from up-State New York [Mr. CULKIN], because he has been a constant champion of the dairy industry and the farmer. The speech he just delivered indicated the possibilities for further reduction in the cost of living by the stamping out of the trade practices which have made it almost impossible for the farmer to live, while at the same time contributed to an increase in the price of foodstuffs.

I do hope, however, that we here in the United States will not get the persecution complex. It would seem that every day we can read of business organizations, large industries, labor unions, and officials of labor unions being indicted for abuses in violation of the law. We may have some terrible conditions in the dairy industry and some others; if so, let us clear up these violations by proceeding in a calm and orderly fashion, and not on a wave of hysteria. I hope that our position here today will not cause the Attorney General to go on a rampage which might give the impression that every successful business is a monopoly and is run in a crooked manner.

I propose to vote for the Voorhis amendment because I hope as a result of the money provided this work of the Attorney General of fighting collusion and other unfair practices will continue, and successfully result in the reduction in the cost of food and the other necessities of life. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, it is rather refreshing to see the urge for an amendment increasing an appropriation coming from the economy side of the House. You know it all gets back to the question of just whose interest is involved.

If we approved every item asked by every Member or every group in the House, these appropriation bills would reach enormous proportions. I do not know where all the gentlemen were when we had the bill under consideration. When the committee had the bill under consideration and were hearing interested persons, those who are so zealous now in behalf of the dairy industry and other industries, made no effort to appear before the committee and present their cause. Nothing of particular moment has occurred within the last 2 or 3 weeks to make it so urgent now as against that time. The fact remains that if we are going to hold down these appropriations we must make some cuts and if we wait to do that until everyone is in accord they will not be made.

This committee appreciates the value of the antitrust division. It feels they have been doing a pretty good job. Members of the committee evidenced that feeling by making this one of the two items in the whole bill for the Departments of State, Commerce, Justice, and the Judiciary, in which we increased the Budget request. We gave them $41,000 over the Budget recommendation. Undoubtedly, good could be accomplished if they had two or three million dollars in excess of the amount that has been approved, but I call your attention to the fact that in 1934 this division had $150,000; in 1935 they had $289,000 and a supplement of $125,000. In 1936 they had $420,000; in 1937, $435,000; in 1939, $580,000 and a supplement of $200,000. In 1940 it reached the point of $1,309,000. It occurs to me the House should take stock of the situation and in some sound manner work out this problem over a period of years. I sincerely hope that this amendment will be voted down. I am sure that the Antitrust Division is rendering every service possible with the funds and ability at its disposal. I am also sure that the orderly processes of Government will be served by holding the appropriation to the amount approved by the committee.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. HARE. There is a provision in the appropriation bill where the Attorney General is permitted to employ special attorneys, and is there any reason why he should not use that fund or a portion of it to employ special attorneys to prosecute the monopolies referred to here?

Mr. CALDWELL. Not at all. He has more than half a million dollars available for the employment of special attorneys, and I have no doubt that a number of these men are now engaged and more of them can be put on this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CULKIN and Mr. VOORHIS of California) there were—ayes 27, noes 44.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL: Page 59, line 3, after the words "District of Columbia", strike out "$1,250,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,350,000."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 13 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] was voted down. I ask the indulgence of the House to press upon them the importance of the amendment which I now offer, which would increase the amount of the funds available for the Antitrust Division to $1,350,000. That will be just $41,000 more than they have this year, and it will be just $100,000 more than the committee has recommended.

The committee has made a very favorable report, so far as this Division is concerned, and, with the consent of the House, I shall insert in my remarks the report of the committee and also the statement of Mr. Arnold, of the Antitrust Division, regarding the activities and the profitable operations of the Division, so far as increasing the revenues of the Government is concerned.

The committee in its report said:

ENFORCEMENT OF ANTITRUST AND KINDRED LAWS

The Antitrust Division of the Department has pending at the present time 50 antitrust cases, about 20 of which may be regarded as major cases. In response to committee inquiry, Assistant Attorney General Arnold made a very impressive statement of the need for additional funds in order that the pending major cases may be disposed of and new cases of pressing importance might be instituted. The committee recommend the reading of Mr. Arnold's statement to the Members of the House. It appears from the testimony that it would require an appropriation of approximately $1,500,000 to complete the investigations now under way in the building industry alone.

While the committee recognize that there is a vast potential field of possible activity in the prosecution of antitrust cases, and that results to date of intensified antitrust drives indicate savings of several hundred million dollars to the consuming public as a result thereof, nonetheless, the impelling need for strict economy in governmental expenditures must be given serious consideration and weighed in the scales opposite the desire to project the Government's arm at further length into the multifarious fields of Federal activities. The committee have approved the sum of $1,250,000, an increase over the Budget estimates of $41,000, impressed as it is with the need for lending every possible encouragement to the commendable work that is being done by the Division. In normal times, with a balanced Budget, the committee would be disposed to go considerably further in adding the amounts that would be necessary to bring to account all those violating the terms of the antitrust laws. With the exception of the Patent Office in the Department of Commerce, this is the only increase over the Budget estimates that has been made in the entire bill. In both these instances this special consideration was shown to revenue-producing agencies.

Thurman Arnold, in his statement to the committee, outlined the success of the work of his Division as follows:

I gave you a list of 17 definite and specific investigations which, if properly conducted, would require the services of about 162 additional men. That would have necessitated an increase in our appropriation of $1,131,560. The Division was granted an increase of $519,000, making a total appropriation of $1,300,000 for this fiscal year. We have been working under that appropriation for the past 6 months and will continue for the next 6 months. I presume, therefore, that my first duty here today is to give an accounting of the way in which we have utilized, and expect to utilize, that appropriation.

ANTITRUST DIVISION IS A PROFITABLE AGENCY OF GOVERNMENT

Before I begin on this, however, I should like to remind you of one statement which I made to you last year. I told you that the appropriation for the Antitrust Division had no relation to any Budget-balancing activities. I said that the Antitrust Division would return to the Government in fines and penalties more than the amount of its appropriation. I am prepared to support that statement with the figures, even though the year is only half over.

Our appropriation for this year is $1,300,000. To date our record of fines and penalties collected or assessed amounts to $2,421,000; and on the basis of cases now pending, which should be completed within the present fiscal year, there is an additional total in potential fines of approximately $3,800,000. If this latter estimate proves to be correct, the Antitrust Division will return to the General Treasury approximately $6,221,000, or a profit of about $5,000,000 on its year's work. Those who violate these laws pay for their enforcement.

Yet the actual cash returned to the Treasury is infinitesimal in comparison to the amount of money saved by the consuming public conjectural. They are based on the normal trend of increase which might have been expected in about seven industries had not antitrust suits been pending against those concerns. These studies indicate that approximately $270,000,000 annually will be saved the consuming public as a result of seven major antitrust cases.

* * * * * * *

It is apparent, therefore, that an adequate appropriation for the Antitrust Division is not an expense on the taxpayers of the country. On the other hand, it is an investment which not only proves profitable in a fiscal sense, but, far more important, helps to preserve equality of opportunity by preventing price raises which have no other justification than the means of conspiracy and the erection of artificial and illegal restraints of trade.

There are 55 cases pending in this Antitrust Division at this time. They cover a wide range of alleged law violations. I enlist the attention of the Members from the larger cities, and especially those who are in cities in which the milk monopolies control prices, taking more and more from the consumers' pockets, at the same time holding down the price to the farmers, to this situation. The great dairy industry involves a business of more than $2,000,000,000 annually. It is one of the largest industries in the country, and yet there is but one big action pending in this law-enforcement drive against a monopoly that controls the milk supply in practically all of the large centers of the country. There is but one action pending today so far as those monopolies are concerned.

In the limited time I have I cannot go into the details of the matter, but I will say that 10 years ago Congress passed an act appropriating $300,000 to permit the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the dairy monopolies. In all of the investigations carried on by the Federal Trade Commission, there was none in which there were many charges made as in its report upon the dairy combinations.

We have had the fight here in Washington under consideration. The Schulte bill and the investigation made by the District Committee have commanded wide attention. Conditions have been revealed here which have, without action on the bill itself, compelled certain changes to be made in the distribution of milk in the city of Washington, with some reductions of prices to consumers.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. I do.

Mr. SCHULTE. Speaking of monopolies, and we have all heard of the milk situation in the District of Columbia, is it not true that there should be an investigation in the District of Columbia alone, when it has been shown that one dairy made a net profit of $461,000 in this District?

Mr. HULL. I think that an investigation should be made here, and one of the purposes of trying to obtain this $100,000 of additional funds is because there are alleged violations here which the division has tried to investigate, particularly regarding the ice-cream situation, and funds are needed for that purpose. On the other hand in New York City some investigations have been had by the city government. Mayor LaGuardia has endeavored to cut the price of milk down to a point where the poor people can obtain it.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. KERR. I think my distinguished colleague has convinced this House that the milk monopoly ought to be broken up. Does he not think he would be able to convince Mr. Arnold that he should use a portion of this $1,250,000 to prosecute this monopoly?

Mr. HULL. Our understanding is, after repeated conferences, that the reason further action has not been taken is because the Chicago case has taken the larger part of the funds set aside for that purpose.

Mr. KERR. I think I am in a position to inform my friend that no part of this $1,250,000 has been earmarked. As much of it as is necessary can be used to break this up.

Mr. HULL. That is true. There are 55 actions pending, and just 1 investigation regarding the dairy situation, and that is the Chicago case.

Mr. KERR. The gentleman need not be alarmed about the 55 actions pending, because many of those will probably never be adjudicated.

Mr. HULL. There are at least 20 key cases in the 55. All we are asking for on the part of the dairymen of this country is to let us have a little share of the time and attention of the Department of Justice in trying to stop some of the exactions, at least, of the monopolies that rob the farmers and the consumers alike. This amount is small. I hope the committee may consent to the allowance of at least the amount we are asking.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] is recognized.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I would not trespass again upon the time of the Committee except that this matter is, I repeat, of vital importance to three and one-half million dairymen and their ten million dependents. I think the House will be remiss in its obvious duty to that great group of Americans if it fails to take appropriate action in this situation.

The amendment as it is now presented provides for an additional $100,000. That is the figure we originally considered. We had no advance knowledge of the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS]. We have been over this situation in detail. A committee of 10, representing the dairy interests, have given intense study to the records of the Federal Trade Commission and have come to the conclusion that a frontal attack on monopoly is the only way to cure the situation.

May I say to my friends on the Republican side, and I do not wish to intrude upon their respective legislative consciences, that in 1932 and 1936 the western farmers ran out on the Republican Party, and the Republican Party at this time had better watch its step in the North and Northeast. That is said in all kindness but in all firmness. The proper munitioning of the antitrust branch of government for the purpose outlined here will bring the comforts of living and indeed life itself to 10,000,000 people who are now being scattered to the four winds by this monopolistic performance. You can ignore that or not, as you see fit, but I trust that in good conscience you will support this amendment and give the dairyman a breathing spell.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I very much hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL] will be carried. I trust that inasmuch as it is only 40 percent as much money as my amendment contained, the opposition will only be 40 percent as great, in which case the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CULKIN. What the gentleman says is true. May I say this Division produced revenue twofold over the amount which it cost to operate it. They have reduced this item $59,000, and all we are asking you to do is to put that back and $41,000 with it.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Some of our good friends are talking about balancing the Budget. I am wondering if they know the conditions of the dairy farmers of the United States and if they would want to save $100,000 if they would go out in the country and see the drudgery that these women and children have to undergo trying to make a living, with this monopoly controlling the products of the farmers. Everyone of you should stand up here and support this amendment.

Mr. CULKIN. I thank the gentleman.

I leave the pending question to your good conscience. I have done my bit. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL] is recognized.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, this involves the same principle determined a few minutes ago. The difference is in amount only. I do not think additional argument is necessary. The Antitrust Division is being treated very liberally, and if ten or twelve million American citizens are affected by the conditions complained of, it seems to me that out of $1,250,000 the Antitrust Division can find funds to correct that evil if it is as glaring as is reported.

Mr. CULKIN. Did not the record before the gentleman's committee show that all these funds are earmarked for existing prosecutions?

Mr. CALDWELL. The record showed no such condition to exist.

Mr. CULKIN. That is my information.

Mr. CALDWELL. The truth is that this Division, like every other bureau and division of the Government, treats every bloc that comes to it in just this way. They say, "We are sorry, but all of our funds are earmarked. You will have to get additional funds," and the drive is for larger and larger appropriations.

Mr. CULKIN. Well, does the gentleman know anything about the dairymen's situation under this monopoly? Has he looked into it?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; and I deplore the conditions that exist.

Mr. CULKIN. Here is a chance for you to correct it.

Mr. CALDWELL. This is no time to increase this appropriation. I sincerely hope the amendment will be voted down.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HULL].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CULKIN) there were—ayes 37 and noes 67.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I send a privileged motion to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HOFFMAN moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, the attention of the Members, and especially of the gentleman who offered an amendment to increase the funds for the antitrust division, so that those who interfered with the production and distribution of milk in the Chicago area might be prosecuted and a monopoly of the distribution and sale of milk in the city of Chicago ended, is called to the case of Lake Valley Farm Products, Inc., a corporation; Lake View Cooperative of Watertown, Wis., etc., et al., v. Milk Wagon Drivers' Union, Local 753, et al., decided November 29, 1939, by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit.

A reading of the decision shows—and I have a copy of the opinion here in my hand—that it was brought by the plaintiffs, one of whom was the Lake Valley Farm Products, Inc., which was engaged in processing and distributing milk and dairy products in Chicago; another of whom was the Lake View Cooperative of Watertown, Wis., an organization of Wisconsin farmers; another, Josef Wagner, an individual; and Amalgamated Dairy Drivers, Local Industrial Union No. 819—all of these engaged either in the production, distribution, or sale of milk—against Milk Wagon Drivers' Union of Chicago, Local 753, and the officers and trustees of that union.

The Farm Products Co. purchased its daily requirements of fluid milk from the Lake View Cooperative of Watertown, Wis. The milk was then, after being pasteurized and bottled, sold to others, who owned and operated their own automobile-truck delivery equipment. These latter in turn sold and delivered the milk to various stores, which in turn sold it to the general public on a cash-and-carry plan. These last-named distributors were not members of the defendant union.

Often on the floor Members have talked about the wide spread that exists between producer and consumer. A part of that spread is made up of the price charged for distribution. The price charged for distribution is increased because certain labor leaders insist that all those engaged in such distribution join and pay dues to a union. It is evident to all that the services of some of these union drivers are not necessary if the milk can be sold direct to the consumer from the store on a cash-and-carry basis.

It is just another illustration of whether new and more economical methods of distribution shall be adopted and used when their adoption throws one class of citizens out of work while benefiting producers and consumers. Naturally, no one wants to see anyone lose a job; but it is undoubtedly true that new methods, new procedures, invariably cost the jobs of some while creating new positions.

I do not hold a brief for those who engage in monopolistic practices and I am thoroughly in sympathy with the breaking up of such practices. On the other hand, some of the abuses which are practiced can be cured by an amendment of the Wagner Act, which has done so much to aid racketeering, bring about violence, and add to the cost that the ultimate consumer must pay.

It is my contention that the farmer has the right to produce and to sell his milk in Chicago to anyone who has the money and desires to buy; that distributors have the right to open stores and sell that milk without the intervention of any other organization, except those organizations which protect the health of the citizen.

I wonder if there is any Member of this body who will stand up on the floor and defend such actions as those to which I now make reference. Let me read to you from this decision of the circuit court of appeals:

> The Farm Products Co. is a cut-rate dairy in that it distributes its milk through retail stores by cash-and-carry sale, and at prices substantially less than the generally prevailing price for milk delivered by the dairy to the home. Because of the relatively large amount of milk delivered to each retail store, the cost of such delivery is substantially less than the cost of delivering milk on a retail route to the doorstep of the ultimate consumer.
> The growth of the cut-rate milk business in Chicago has been accompanied by violence to the distributing stores. They have had their windows broken; they have been bombed, set afire; they have been submitted to stench bombs and to other acts of violence. Cut-rate dairy plants have been bombed, have had machinery smashed, and their delivery trucks have been seized and destroyed, and they have been submitted to other acts of violence.
> Picketing by the defendant union has all taken place at and in front of stores selling the products of the plaintiff dairy, and no picketing has taken place at the plaintiff dairy plant. In some instances deliveries of other necessary food products into stores selling plaintiff's dairy products have ceased.
> Fifteen to twenty stores distributing the products of plaintiff dairy were lost in the month preceding the filing of the bill of complaint; 25 to 30 stores were similarly lost since the commencement of the action; more than 100 of such stores have been picketed, and there is no way to ascertain the number of consumer patrons lost by the acts of the defendant. No labor dispute exists between plaintiff dairy and its workers.

The stores destroyed and damaged were not those that belonged only to big corporations. I call your attention to this statement from the finding of the court:

> The store of the storekeeper (some of whom were poor women struggling to make a living) was either bombed or bricks were thrown through the plate-glass windows of such stores or other acts of violence were committed.

Here is the difficulty, when the farmers producing this milk have it distributed through these stores, they get a higher price than they receive from the dairy that delivers it from door to door. This is similar to the situation that exists here in Washington today; the people can purchase their milk at a lower price from certain stores than they can the other way.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. In just a moment.

Yet in between the fellow who feeds and milks the cows and the family which uses the milk in the city comes this wagon-drivers' union and says to the farmer, "You shall not deliver the milk that your cows produce to the families in Chicago which want to use it, unless you get it through our organization."

What right has any organization to step in between producer and consumer and levy a charge, either upon production or consumption, for a service that is not necessary or that is not wanted?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is the motion to strike out the last word in order? I ask this in view of the ruling made by the Chair the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana for 5 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan, as we all know, is very apprehensive that some particular organization or some member of a union might cause him a lot of embarrassment, and he is trying to leave us with the impression that the union milk drivers in the city of Chicago are the ones who are destroying all these dairy stores. I asked the gentleman to yield for a question so I might correct him, but he refused to.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Just a moment. I ask the gentleman to yield since he has referred to me.

Mr. SCHULTE. In just a moment. The gentleman would not yield to me.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But the gentleman made a misstatement about me.

Mr. SCHULTE. I said the gentleman from Michigan was laboring under the impression that union milk drivers were aiding in the destroying of stores.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is entirely wrong. These stores were destroyed to aid certain union milk drivers. There are plenty of good, peaceable union milk drivers.

Mr. SCHULTE. The gentleman was reading from a record.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; a finding of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals.

Mr. SCHULTE. And the gentleman read that drivers belonging to the local milk drivers' union in the city of Chicago were destroying milk stores.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; that the stores were destroyed to promote the interest of the drivers.

Mr. SCHULTE. I wish to state to my friend from Michigan that just a few moments ago we voted down two proposed amendments, one offered by the gentleman from California, the other by the gentleman from Wisconsin, increasing this appropriation, the former by $100,000, which, if passed, would have allowed Mr. Arnold to increase this activity.

I wonder if my good friend from Michigan has ever gone into the situation to see where some of these monopolies that we are talking about have hired thugs to go out and destroy stores—thugs, not union men. I wonder if my good friend——

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. Yes; I will be more courteous than the gentleman was to me. I yield to him even though he would not yield to me.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I favor the prosecutions carried on by Assistant Attorney General Arnold against monopolies.

Mr. SCHULTE. That is right, but I do not want the gentleman to leave the impression with the Members of this House that every time something happens, a man carrying a union card is responsible. I want to leave the impression with the gentleman that in a great many investigations that have been made it was shown that the monopoly itself was hiring the thugs under the guise of union men to destroy some of their competitors' property and to destroy competition. That is why I am so anxious to investigate monopoly—to show that they are responsible for most of the trouble.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am not defending them. No one is more willing, no one will do more to aid in enforcing the law than I. That is my reason for so often on the floor asking for amendments to the National Labor Relations Act which will tend to prevent civil strife, end violence, and enable men who want to work to do so.

The Clerk read as follows:

Miscellaneous salaries and expenses, field: For salaries not otherwise specifically provided for (not to exceed $110,000) and for such other expenses for the field service, Department of Justice, as may be authorized or approved by the Attorney General, including experts, and notarial fees or like services and stenographic work in taking depositions, at such rates of compensation as may be authorized or approved by the Attorney General, so much as may be necessary in the discretion of the Attorney General for such expenses in the District of Alaska, and in courts other than Federal courts; patent applications and contested proceedings involving inventions; rent of rooms; supplies and equipment, including the exchange of typewriting and adding machines, firearms and ammunition therefor; purchase of law books, including exchange thereof, and the Federal Reporter and continuations thereto as issued, $317,500: Provided, That not to exceed $2 per volume shall be paid for the current and future volumes of the United States Code Annotated.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to interrogate the acting chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations about the item of $1,400,000 for the Lands Division. I read the report on this appropriation and also the hearings. There is an indication that the sum is insufficient to carry on the work which will probably be required of the Lands Division. In the interest of sound administrative policy, I think we ought to appropriate a sufficient amount. This work must be carried on; the necessary operations cannot be suspended.

Mr. CALDWELL. I may say to the gentleman that the Budget sent up an estimate of $1,400,000, and the committee felt that while there was some merit in the contention of the Lands Division that it needed more, it might nevertheless get along expeditiously on the amount allowed.

Mr. MAHON. The Budget estimate for next year is approximately $300,000 less than last year. Retrenchment in some of our Government programs cannot be reflected for many months to come in the operation of the Lands Division. I think we are making a mistake in this item.

While I am on my feet I would like to compliment the Lands Division and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL], acting chairman of this Subcommittee on Appropriations, for the effort that is being made to eliminate a lot of the red tape in acquiring titles for post office building sites, and lands for all other purposes required by the Federal Government. I hope this will materialize into something really worth while for the Government.

Mr. CALDWELL. May I say to the gentleman that I am convinced if they will get down to the heart of the matter and eliminate all of the unnecessary details, they can take $1,400,000 and close these titles without delay.

Mr. MAHON. May I point out to the gentleman, however, that perhaps some legislation may be required in order to have that done? In fact, it was suggested to the Committee on Appropriations that such legislation was being prepared.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. What is this for? For post office sites?

Mr. MAHON. No. This item covers all title acquisition work by all divisions of the Government, with possibly two or three exceptions. This is a very important item. Mr. Norman Littell, the able Assistant Attorney General and Chief of the Lands Division, states in the hearings that the Division now has pending over $3,000,000,000 in litigation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and expenses of special attorneys, and so forth: For compensation of special attorneys and assistants to the Attorney General and to United States district attorneys employed by the Attorney General to aid in special cases, and for payment of foreign counsel employed by the Attorney General in special cases, $575,000, no part of which, except for payment of foreign counsel, shall be used to pay the compensation of any persons except attorneys duly licensed and authorized to practice under the laws of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia: Provided, That the amount paid as compensation out of the funds herein appropriated to any person employed hereunder shall not exceed the rate of $10,000 per annum: Provided further, That reports be submitted to the Congress on the 1st day of July and January showing the names of the persons employed hereunder, the annual rate of compensation or amount of any fee paid to each together with a description of their duties.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Amendment offered by Mr. CARTER: Page 62, line 11, strike out "$575,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$400,000"

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, my amendment proposes to reduce the amount available for special attorneys from the figures carried in the bill, $575,000, down to $400,000. Last year there was carried in the appropriation bill $650,000 for this purpose; therefore it was scaled down by the committee $75,000, and I thought at the time we made this reduction it should be reduced to at least $300,000. If you will turn to the hearings, beginning on page 361, you will find a list there of these special attorneys covering more than three pages. What their specific duties are, we do not know. In fact, there is a provision in this bill requiring the Department to make a report to the Congress as to just what these special attorneys are doing. Until such time as we have this report we should cut down on this amount, then if an additional sum is needed we can provide whatever is necessary for carrying on any work that is necessary to be carried on by these special attorneys.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. For a brief question.

Mr. COCHRAN. May I say that since the law has been enacted the Attorney General has made a report annually, and any time the gentleman or anyone else wants to see it, all he has to do is to go to the office of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and it will be found there. The report also states the duties the various assistants are performing.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, There are set out in the hearings some very general duties that these men are performing. We had this information before the committee, but may I say to the gentleman from Missouri that the committee was not satisfied with the information? If it satisfies the gentleman, that is all very well, but it does not satisfy the membership of the committee; therefore we wrote that provision in this bill.

May I say that the Attorney General's office ought to be staffed sufficiently, and it ought to be staffed in the regular way. This appropriation has nothing to do with the regular staff of the Attorney General's office. It covers a group of attorneys that the Attorney General appoints personally here and there throughout the country. There has come to the committee certain rumors that many of these attorneys are doing very little for the compensation that they receive. If you scan this list, you will find that under "duties" will be stated "special matters." That is all that is stated about their duties—"special matters" or "special assignments made by the Attorney General." I think that this is a place in the bill where we can save a few thousand dollars without injuring the service rendered by the Government; and I trust that the Committee will adopt my amendment.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, if the committee really wanted to know what the special attorneys are doing, all they had to do was ask the Department for a detailed report. I do not believe the Committee on Appropriations has ever asked a Government agency for detailed information and met with a refusal to supply it. The departments respond to all such requests.

What do the attorneys do? Our courts now are choked with cases. The district attorneys and many of the judges are working night and day. There has been vast improvements where very large sums are being spent in the gentleman from California's own section mainly, around Oakland and Alameda. One of the jobs for a special attorney is, when there is a large tract of land to be taken over, where there are any number of property owners, he must examine the titles and also go before the court in condemnation proceedings. Instead of piling all this work on the United States attorney and his assistants, a special assistant is appointed to handle such cases, and as soon as it is completed he is separated from the service or assigned to other special duties.

There are cases that have been delayed in the courts for a period of years, where a special assistant has spent months and months studying the facts and preparing for trial. He appears in court and takes care of that case in lieu of the district attorney. He also goes before the circuit court of appeals and at times the Supreme Court on the same case.

The gentleman from California [Mr. CARTER] refers to the hearings. I note one special assistant is in charge of what is known as the California movie cases, which involves alleged criminals charged with violating the internal revenue laws. I understand in that case the Government might collect millions in additional taxes. This one case, if it is successful, will bring in enough to pay all the assistants for years. We have a new and most able Attorney General, a man who has just taken over the office. Give him a chance and at least let him have the amount the committee has recommended [Applause.]

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALTER to the amendment offered by Mr. CARTER: Strike out "$400,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$650,000."

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment merely restores to the bill the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. I believe the committee could not have suggested a poorer place in this bill to attempt to economize. For a number of years the Committee on the Judiciary has had under consideration bills that provide for compensation for attorneys who are selected to perform special services. Just recently we considered the question of providing compensation of upward of $100,000 in a certain case. Unless we make it possible for the Attorney General to retain men who are highly specialized in a particular line of work we are going to have such bills before us continually.

The work performed by the people who are compensated from this item is of a highly specialized nature. I call the attention of the Committee to the fact that last year a man especially selected to prosecute a tax case recovered $11,000,000 where the regularly employed assistant in the Department of Justice lost the case in the court of original jurisdiction. It seems to me the work done in that case alone justifies the Committee in restoring the amount the Budget felt is necessary for this work.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. The attorneys who were employed in that case had an arrangement with the Department of Justice that they were each to get the maximum fee of $10,000, plus additional reasonable compensation.

Mr. WALTER. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. After the case was all over and settled they came to Congress asking for a bonus of $340,000 in addition, and that bill is now on the calendar.

Mr. WALTER. Precisely.

Mr. MICHENER. And the gentleman favors giving it to them.

Mr. WALTER. I cannot yield further.

This is a practice that has existed for a number of years. When the newly selected Attorney General and the Solicitor General appeared before our committee last week they were interrogated about this practice. They said it would not go further. We feel there should be a stop put to it. After all, it is a pretty bad thing for the United States to give work to attorneys on a contingent-fee basis. If it is to be the policy of the new Attorney General to have a complete understanding with specially selected experts before they are retained in particular matters, we at the outset of this policy will cripple him if we take $75,000 from the appropriation that the Department certainly can and does justify.

As far as the work is concerned that the men have done, it has been reported in detail in the report of the hearings. Of course, it has been impossible to describe in the report just exactly what the duties were, but, opening this copy of the hearings at random, I find here the name of a man on the roll at $6,500 a year. This man handles matters involving trespass on public lands, Indian rights, and other miscellaneous matters in the trial section of the Land Division. I know this man has been busily engaged in that type of work, for which he is particularly qualified, ever since he was appointed. Of course, the particular cases he has tried are not enumerated, but this description of his duties is ample to show just exactly what he has been doing.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CARTER. Does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania believe it would be in the interest of orderly procedure and of better organization, if this man's services are needed, that he be appointed to the staff of the Attorney General? Should not all this work be handled through the regular staff of the Attorney General, with possibly a few exceptions?

Mr. WALTER. No; I do not agree with the gentleman because, after all, you will then find inadequately compensated lawyers called on to represent the United States in litigation in which on the other side are the best lawyers available.

Certainly the Government of the United States ought to be in a position to present the best possible case through the services of highly trained experts.

Much of this money is expended in patent cases, cases in which highly trained specialists are needed. They stack up against men who are paid many times the per diem of the United States attorney. I believe that the attorneys for the United States employed in this type of work, receive less than $25 a day. Out of this appropriation comes the compensation to pay some of the men engaged in this work.

I sincerely trust that at this time, when the Attorney General is going to make an effort to depart from the old system of compensating on a contingent basis, we do nothing that will interfere with his program. All of us have the highest regard for the Attorney General, and I, for one, feel confident that he will see to it that every cent we appropriate for his department will be wisely spent.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much to have to differ with my congenial and good friend from California, a member of the committee, because in the short time it has been my privilege to serve with him in this special capacity I have learned to admire and respect his unusually good judgment, his sincerity and integrity in considering every item of this bill.

I can understand why this appropriation for employment of special attorneys by the Attorney General seems large, but when we take into consideration all the evidence before the committee, there are a number of times when the Government is in need of special talent, not simply legal talent but frequently the Government is called upon to defend or to prosecute cases in which additional qualifications are just as essential as a man's legal fitness; that is, he must be a man of highly technical training in order to represent the Government effectively and efficiently. Not infrequently it is necessary to employ lawyers who are expert civil engineers as well. My thought was, when this item was passed upon in the committee, that the amendment just voted down with reference to the milk investigation would be taken care of by this appropriation just as well as by increasing the appropriation at other places. I also had in mind the possibility of investigating an alleged monopoly in farm machinery and farm equipment. Now, the average lawyer would not be able to make this investigation. It would be necessary to get some attorney who is probably trained in engineering in order to make an investigation of this kind intelligently and effectively. He should certainly be familiar with the technique of the trade and industry, and this would be in addition to his legal training. However, I cannot go with my friend from Pennsylvania and say the appropriation should be increased, because the committee, after due consideration of all the evidence and all the facts presented, felt that this coming year with this appropriation, the Department of Justice should be able to handle all of these special investigations. Furthermore, I would like to call attention to the last provision in this paragraph, which states:

Provided further, That reports be submitted to the Congress on the first day of July and January showing the names of the persons employed hereunder, the annual rate of compensation or amount of any fee paid to each, together with a description of their duties.

To my mind this provision takes care of any possibility of the Department employing anyone and sending him out on a wild-goose chase or employing anyone where he would not render efficient service for the compensation received. On the 1st of July or the 1st of January, Congress would have the right to amend by resolution and say that none of this appropriation should be available for the purposes mentioned in the report, provided we should consider the money was being spent unwisely.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, as stated, there are two amendments before the Committee, the first a proposal to reduce the appropriation to $400,000 and the other to increase it to $650,000. It seems to me that somewhere between those figures the Committee must be right. [Laughter.]

I sincerely respect the views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] and I may say that I sympathize with him in his argument. He is sound and able in nearly every respect—this being one of the few exceptions. The Committee very carefully considered this question and in reducing the item from $650,000 to $575,000, we allowed enough funds for the Attorney General to handle efficiently and expeditiously the affairs of his office.

It is necessary to reduce these appropriations if we are going to ever reach the point of a balanced Budget. I sincerely hope both amendments will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CARTER) there were—ayes 58, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Probation system, United States courts: For salaries and expenses of probation officers, as authorized by the act entitled "An act to amend the act of March 4, 1925, chapter 521, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1930 (18 U. S. C. 726), $810,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to defray the salary or expenses of any probation officer whose work fails to comply with the official orders, regulations, and probation standards promulgated by the Attorney General: Provided further, That no funds herein appropriated shall be used to defray the salary or expenses of any probation officer unless the district judge shall have so far as possible required the appointee to conform with the qualifications prescribed by the Attorney General: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to abridge the right of the district judges to appoint probation officers, or to make such orders as may be necessary to govern probation officers in their own courts.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CALDWELL: Page 68, line 7, after the total, strike out the colon, insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, the first proviso might by itself accomplish a useful purpose, but coupled with the third proviso they neutralize each other, and I think all of the language ought to go out. I am informed that this committee amendment has the approval of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Structural and mechanical care of the building and grounds: For such expenditures as may be necessary to enable the Architect of the Capitol to carry out the duties imposed upon him by the act approved May 7, 1934 (40 U. S. C. 13a–13d), including improvements, maintenance, repairs, equipment, supplies, materials, and appurtenances, special clothing for workmen; purchase of waterproof wearing apparel; and personal and other services, and for snow removal by hire of men and equipment or under contract without compliance with sections 3709 and 3744 of the Revised Statutes (41 U. S. C. 5, 16), $65,000.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CALDWELL: Page 72, line 14, after the comma after the word "services", insert "including temporary labor without reference to the Classification and Retirement Acts, as amended."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, this language was inadvertently omitted by the committee. It takes certain employees of the Supreme Court from under the civil-service classification.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries: Chief justice and four judges; chief clerk at not exceeding $6,500; auditor at not exceeding $5,000; and all other officers and employees of the court, $127,500.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARE: Page 74, line 10, after the word "court", strike out "$127,500" and insert "$127,660."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment accomplishes the purpose the committee had in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 501. The total amount used on an annual basis for administrative within-grade promotions for officers and employees under any appropriation or other fund made available in this act shall not exceed the amount determined by the Bureau of the Budget to be available for such purpose on the basis of the Budget estimate for such appropriation or fund exclusive of new money in any such Budget estimate for such administrative promotions.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following motion, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. REED of New York moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I hope I may have the attention of the House. I do not want this Congress or the people of the country to be misled by this so-called housing census. I want the country and the Congress to differentiate between the housing census and the regular census. Whether the Congress is aware of it or not, the people are fully aware that they are being imposed upon by a proposed census that is to be taken on April 1 under the guise of inquiring into the housing conditions of the United States. It was never the intention of the Congress to pry into the personal affairs of people, as it is now revealed it is proposed to do under the questions which have been prepared for the regular political enumerators, which will require every person above 18 years of age to answer and which inquire into their personal incomes. I want to disabuse the minds of the Members of this House as to the correctness of the statement that Harry Hopkins sent out to the public. He would lead you to believe and lead the people of the country to believe that these questions have been asked before in previous censuses taken in this country; and yet, if you will read his document sent out, you will find that he states there that for the first time these questions relating to income are to be asked. The questions pry into that in every conceivable way. The people do not object to the regular census so long as it keeps off this question of income, earnings, commissions, and all of these private affairs. I am telling you that the people are up in arms. You never intended, and the committee that reported out this bill never intended, that these questions should be asked; and let me point out to you that these questions have to be answered under the pain and penalty of $100 fine or 6 months in jail, or both.

I think the people are going to be in absolute revolt on this matter. My mail was never heavier on any question, except the court fight, than it is now. I have already heard from 11 States, from State-wide organizations, from Legion organizations, from a Veterans of Foreign Wars post, from many patriotic organizations. They resent and protest. They are preparing petitions, and you will hear from them. This proposed housing act, which would involve an expenditure of $800,000,000, you voted down, and this present Census Housing Act is predicated on that act. When two writers went to the Bureau of the Census and asked the character of the questions, two articles in two different publications were published, and in neither of these did the questions in regard to income appear. In fact, the Bureau of the Census at that time never suspected that they would be forced to insert the snooping questions, contrary to the spirit and language of the Census Act. I do not know whether it was Harry Hopkins or Nathan Straus, or who it may have been, who made the demand, but it does not harmonize with the liberties and traditions of our constitutional form of government. I say to you it places us in a ridiculous position to come in here and ask us to appropriate money for the Dies committee to investigate subversive activities in this country and then find ourselves going into a snooping game comparable to the dictatorial processes that you see abroad. Now is the time to stop this. We tried the other day. I know that you Members of Congress fail to realize the significance of this. In one dictatorial country today they have a curfew sound, and, under penalty of fine and imprisonment, no person can leave his home during that day until the officers can go in and examine into the private affairs of that house. Are we going further along this totalitarian line or are we going to stop it now? Why spend this $8,000,000 when you are making a gesture of retrenchment? Why spend it now to take these census takers from their legitimate jobs and force them into this position where they become a stench in the nostrils of every American citizen? You have it in your power to stop it, and you ought to stop it. You were not for it in the beginning. I ask you as patriotic Americans to examine the list of inquisitorial questions that have been crowded and crammed and forced into this census questionnaire. I want you to read the penalties involved, to the end that you will not make any mistake when you vote on this question, which I think you will have an opportunity to do this very day.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. Does the gentleman recall the colloquy I had with the leader on the Democratic side relating to looking under the bed if there had not been any privies?

Mr. REED of New York. I do not recall it.

Mr. GIFFORD. Now, if they want to inquire how many privies there are, or there does not happen to be one on the premises, must they look under the bed to find all that money, if they are refused?

Mr. REED of New York. I just want to say to you if you will read the RECORD of yesterday, I just took a few excerpts from letters from the finest group of Americans you can find in this country. They do not object to the regular census, but they rebel against being made the victims of bureaucratic tyranny.

Mr. GIFFORD. Was that privy question in previous census takings?

Mr. REED of New York. Of course it was not, and many more questions that in intent and purpose seek to pry into the intimate affairs of the people.

I urge you, now that you have an opportunity to stop this communistic, totalitarian trend, that you stop it now. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I call your attention to an excerpt from a letter written to me by a young married woman in Olean, N. Y., protesting against the personal-affairs phase of the coming census. The youth of our land is not insensible to the abuse and indignity involved in this subtle totalitarian technique to evade the spirit and the letter of our Bill of Rights:

DEAR CONGRESSMAN REED: I am writing to assure you that you have many strong supporters among the younger element of your district in regard to the bill you recently introduced before Congress to repeal the housing portion of the April population census.

I am 19 and my husband is 23. Although the general opinion is that the American youth does not appreciate fully his liberties and advantages, I am inclined to disagree. At home my husband and I often speak of our thankfulness that God allowed us such a wonderful homeland. In the company of boys and girls our own age or of our fathers' and grandfathers' generation, the same feeling is prevalent constantly. Perhaps the war in Europe has brought to light this close-knit, heartfelt Americanism—but it has always been there.

I believe that is why there is such widely demonstrated resentment concerning the forthcoming German roll call, the census.

When I began to realize my existence as an individual, I also realized that I was allowed to think according to my own tenets. I learned to respect the intelligence of my neighbor and to love veracity. In school I discovered that I was a part of my own Government and that for years men had lived and died to build this Government before me that I might enjoy the freedom a man had a right to own. A sensation of well-being has been mine since I learned that.

Mr. Chairman, a record vote this afternoon on the motion to recommit this census appropriation will disclose to every true American where each Representative in Congress stands on this important issue.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the motion is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 73 for the purpose of offering two minor amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARTER: On page 73, in line 15, strike out "$105,700" and insert "$105,780."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, the committee has no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARTER: On page 73, in line 22, strike out "$6,800" and insert "$6,720."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 37 for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand the gentleman wants to add "the District of Columbia," or some such words?

Mr. CALDWELL. It is the language that went out yesterday on a point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. If the gentleman will permit the amendment to be read for the information of the House, I think he will understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CALDWELL: On page 37, after the word "work" in line 17, insert "including personal services and rentals in the District of Columbia and elsewhere."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment should read "line 15, after the comma," instead of after the word "work," because the word "work" went out on the point of order.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman is correct, but the words "and for the carrying on other authorized census work" were not subject to the point of order, but went out because they were incorporated in other language which did go out. Yesterday I wanted to propose the amendment to put back this language, but inadvertently passed it over.

Mr. TABER. The only thing is the word "work" is out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the word "work" is still in.

Mr. TABER. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the Chair, Mr. BEAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8319, the State, Commerce, Justice, and Judiciary appropriation bill, 1941, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. TABER. I am.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TABER moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: On page 38, line 16, strike out "$17,859,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$15,684,000"; and on page 38, line 20, strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and the following: "No part of the funds herein appropriated shall be used for the so-called housing census."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 65, noes 84.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 135, nays 210, not voting 78, as follows:

INTERPRETATION OF THE TARIFF ACT OF 1930

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 7 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill (H. R. 8367) for the purpose of correcting a situation which has arisen because of a recent interpretation of a paragraph of the Tariff Act of 1930 by the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals. This bill is an emergency measure of such widespread interest and effect, and concerns such an important problem, that I have asked for this time to explain the measure briefly in order to acquaint the membership with its aims and purposes. In the city of Omaha, Nebr., the United States Brush Co., a local industry, is engaged in the business of manufacturing toilet brushes which are used in the beauty and cosmetic industry for the application of nail polish in manicuring work. These brushes are sold widely throughout the entire country to the beauty and manicuring business. The industry in Omaha employs directly in the manufacture of toilet brushes more than 200 persons whose sole source of livelihood is employment in that industry.

The industry is an important factor in the city of Omaha in relieving unemployment to the extent of the number of persons which it employs. The industry started there from small beginnings and has grown under local supervision to its present proportions.

The Tariff Act of 1930 contains a provision imposing a tax of 1 cent each and 50 percent ad valorem on toilet brushes of a certain character. Up until February of 1939 it was generally accepted as fact and law that the manicure toilet brushes manufactured by the United States Brush Co. of Omaha were of the type described in paragraph 1506 of the Tariff Act of 1930, and that any brushes sought to be imported from foreign countries similar thereto carried the tariff duty of 1 cent each and 50 percent ad valorem. In February 1939 the Customs Court of New York, in interpreting paragraph 1506 of the Tariff Act of 1930, held that brushes practically and substantially identical with the brushes manufactured by the United States Brush Co., but which were manufactured in Japan and imported into this country, were not toilet brushes so as to carry the tariff of 1 cent each and 50 percent ad valorem, but that these identical Japanese brushes were in fact what is designated as hair pencils, so that they carried the duty imposed by the act of 1930 on hair pencils. The duty on hair pencils, instead of being 1 cent each plus 50 percent ad valorem, is only 40 percent ad valorem. This interpretation of the existing tariff provisions, namely, paragraph 1506 of the Tariff Act of 1930, had the effect of so reducing the tariff on imported Japanese brushes that they could be imported into this country and sold at so low a figure as to make it impossible for the United States Brush Co. to compete with them in the market. This interpretation of the tariff by the customs court has now been affirmed by the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, and in its opinion the court states that its interpretation is in line with the wording of the Tariff Act, and that the only relief which the American manufacturer of toilet brushes can obtain is such relief as the Congress sees fit to give it by clarifying its intention as to what should be covered by the term "toilet brushes."

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I am always glad to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. About 2 years ago we had a similar case of a factory in Massachusetts just outside of Haverhill, I think in the district of my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES], in which there was produced woolen felt hats. The customs court rendered a decision which said that the higher duties imposed were contrary to law. As a result of that, we took care of the situation along the same line the gentleman is advocating now.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I thank my distinguished colleague for his valuable contribution, and I trust that as a member of the Ways and Means Committee he will assist in taking care of this situation.

It is obvious that the American manufactured article and the Japanese manufactured article are intended to be within the classification of toilet brushes, but because of the fact that these brushes, which are used for toilet purposes, were not in common use at the time the act of 1930 was passed, the intention of Congress was not explicitly stated in the act.

The purpose and intention of the bill which I have today introduced is to clarify the Tariff Act of 1930 by amending paragraph 1506 so as to cause it to represent the real intention of the Congress. The bill is not a new tariff bill. It is not a bill to impose a new tariff duty. It will have the effect of giving the real intention, which should be given to the provision of the Tariff Act, which has been on the statute books since 1930.

To indicate the interest of the people of my home community in this bill it is only necessary to state that a petition signed by more than 65,000 citizens of Omaha has been addressed to the Congress, praying that the Tariff Act be so changed as to give to the home industry employing home people the protection which it is obvious the Congress intended that industry to have; a protection which will really protect by equalizing in part the difference in cost of production obtaining in Japan and the cost of production in the United States. In furtherance of fairness and justice it is to be hoped that the Ways and Means Committee will act speedily upon this measure and report it favorably to the House in order that it may be passed and sent to the Senate for similar action at the earliest possible moment and thus save an American industry which is in great danger of destruction under the present interpretation of the Tariff Act of 1930. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF CLASSIFIED EXECUTIVE CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 217, and ask for its immediate consideration.

House Resolution 217

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 960, a bill extending the classified executive civil service of the United States. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Civil Service, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], and at this time I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this is an open rule providing for 2 hours, general debate on the bill (H. R. 960) extending the classified executive civil service of the United States. The bill will be explained fully and in detail, by the distinguished author of the bill, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK], and I shall not attempt to go into it in the consideration of the rule; however, certain other gentlemen will discuss it pro and con on this rule.

I reserve now the balance of the time on this side and suggest that the gentleman from Indiana use some of his time.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to try in my time to say something about this bill and what is in it, because I have an idea that there are a great many Members who have not had an opportunity to read the hearings or to familiarize themselves with the provisions of the bill.

In the first place, I believe it is fair to say that this bill would permit, as distinguished from require, the President to bring into the civil service, employees in agencies that are now outside the civil service. It would apply to entire agencies that are now outside the civil service or to parts of agencies that are now outside the civil service.

The President now has authority in certain instances by Executive order to bring positions into the civil service. But it has been ruled by the Attorney General that when the Congress of the United States, in creating a new agency, specifically exempted the positions in that agency from civil-service law and the Classification Act there is no power by which the President, as the law now stands, can bring those employees into the civil service. Title I of the bill is calculated to overcome that deficiency and to invest in the President the discretionary authority to bring those employees under the civil service.

Title II of the bill seeks to extend the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923 to the field service. The Civil Service Act is one thing. That is the part of the law that sets up the method of selection and the rules by which employees are selected and come under the civil service. The Classification Act of 1923 fixes the grade and salary of the employees in the civil service who are subject to the operation of the Classification Act. As now written the Classification Act applies only to a part of the civil-service employees in the District of Columbia. Title II of this bill seeks to apply the provisions of the Classification Act to the field service generally over the country, to the end that inequality or alleged inequality shall be wiped out.

As stated by the Civil Service Commission sometime ago—

The Classification Act of 1923 to the extent that it is applicable is a fitting and necessary supplement to the Civil Service Act of 1883. These two statutes constitute the foundation for the development of an efficient employment policy in that one statute requires open competition among qualified persons in filling vacancies and the other requires equal and appropriate compensation to be paid the appointees to such vacancies.

The opposition to this bill will fall generally into two classes: First, this bill will be opposed by those who believe in the patronage system, or the spoils system, as against the merit system. It will be opposed by those who hold, for instance, that a Member of Congress knows more about the qualification of a person for a Government job than can be determined by any sort of an examination that may be fixed or determined.

Then there will be opposition to this bill from those who believe in the merit system in Government service as against the patronage system, who want to see the merit system extended and who have fought for that and stood for that but who believe, honestly and conscientiously, that this bill, as it is now drafted, is not a fair or equitable extension of the merit system.

I believe in the merit system. Such opposition as I have to this bill is of the sort that brings me in the second category. I have given more than lip service to the extension of the merit system. I voted for the postmaster bill and have voted time and again to strike out provisions avoiding the Civil Service Act in measures before us. I may say, not altogether too facetiously, that in the past years here in Washington you have heard a lot of pious talk about the merit system, but time after time when measures have come before this House to be voted on to determine whether or not we should extend the merit system or follow the patronage system the patronage system has almost invariably won out.

I stand for the merit system because I believe, by and large, it gets for the Government service the best people. I believe that people coming into the Government service in many of these positions should have the protection that a permanent tenure gives them. These are some of the reasons why I believe in the extension of the merit system.

As I suggested a moment ago, to me the strange thing is that we have gone along in this House considering bill after bill to create new agencies or to continue the lives of old ones, and time after time, even running down through 1939, in the last session of Congress, whenever that issue has been presented we have found the Members on the side of the aisle to my right standing up in sufficient numbers to take the merit system out of the provisions of the act. We did that in 1937 and subsequently in 1938 in regard to the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation. In 1939 we did it for the Farm Security Administration. In 1939 we did the same thing for the W. P. A. and the P. W. A. In 1938 and in 1939, when we reenacted the Agricultural Adjustment Act, we did the same thing again.

Therefore, I am frank to confess that I am a little overcome at the tremendous anxiety which seems to motivate so many people now in their support of this bill. I wonder if it stems partly from the fact that 1940 is here, with all that November of this year portends. Jobs were filled outside the civil service, and now, when it seems that the political situation will be reversed, we find all of this effort to bring all these people within the purview of the Civil Service and Classification Acts. One might well question whether all this newfound devotion to the merit system is altogether in good faith.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I recognize the gentleman from Indiana as a very hard-working and conscientious member of the committee of which I am a member. May I ask the gentleman, however, if he does not believe that he perhaps makes a misstatement when he says there has not been an extension of the merit system under the so-called Roosevelt administration?

Mr. HALLECK. Well, I may say that during the last 7 years such Executive orders and statutes as have been made to bring employees under the civil service fade into insignificance when compared with the tremendous number of employees who have been brought into the Government under the operation of the patronage system.

This bill has been around for years, and it does seem a little strange to me that there is such tremendous interest in it just at this particular time.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. Yes; briefly.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. And is it not very strange that action is taken upon the bill today before the committee headed by Mr. Justice Reed makes its report as to how the civil service could be improved, and also before the President's Committee for Civil Service Improvement, of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] is a member, has made its report and also before the Council for the Improvement of the Civil Service has made any real report?

Mr. HALLECK. I assume that the statement of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts is correct, although I am not altogether familiar with those matters.

There are many who argue that this bill is not, after all, an extension of the merit system but that it is in truth and in fact a perpetuation of the operation of the spoils system or the patronage system that has heretofore been in vogue.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 additional minutes.

Witnesses came before our committee and they started out by saying that they wanted to see this job of the extension of the merit system fairly done. They were realistic enough to understand and to know that unless the job is fairly done and equitably done, probably it will not stand the test of time, and I think that is one thing we should constantly keep in mind as we consider this bill and the specific provisions of the bill.

I recognize that no party that has ever been in power in this country has been "simon pure" in respect of the extension of the merit system. I am perfectly willing to confess that for my own part, although I will debate and contend with anyone as to the relative extensions of the merit system brought into the Government by my party as distinguished from any other party. Possibly this is the best we can hope for. But we have never in the history of this country seen any such grand-scale effort as this. If some of the things we have had heretofore have been a small dose, believe me, this is a rather large dose. Somebody said to me he thought maybe we had been guilty of petty larceny. Well, if we have been guilty of petty larceny, believe me, this is grand larceny. [Laughter.]

This bill will affect in the neighborhood of 300,000 employees; and there is another thing in connection with this bill that I would like to call to your attention. If affects not only permanent and established agencies of the Government, agencies that we expect will continue at least for some years as a part of our governmental operation, but it includes in addition thereto a lot of agencies that I am convinced are very temporary in their nature. I can see a lot more reason, if you please, for extending the civil service on a rather large scale to the more or less permanent agencies of the Government as distinguished from those which are clearly temporary. The positions of deputy collector of internal revenue and the positions of deputy United States marshal should clearly be under the civil service. Those positions are used definitely as a political-patronage device, and the work performed by all of them is such as to require a person who can be definitely trusted and who devotes his entire time to the service rather than the prosecution of political ends; but I wonder whether or not that same argument can be made for the Disaster Loan Corporation or the Golden Gate International Exposition Commission, the New York World's Fair Commission, the Work Projects Administration, the National Youth Administration, the National Resources Committee, or the National Emergency Council. That the committee recognized something in this direction is best evidenced by the fact that the W. P. A., by a committee amendment, is specifically exempted from the operations of this act.

Now, there is another question involved here that I think is of tremendous importance, and that has to do with the type of examination. The committee had a distinct difference of opinion as to whether or not the employees should be brought in under the competitive or the noncompetitive system. I think it is not improper to suggest that when the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] originally introduced this bill he provided in his bill for competitive examinations. That is the sort of examination that a person must take when he first undertakes to obtain a classified status in the civil service. The hearings reveal the very frank statement of the chairman as to why that provision was abandoned.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman please define a noncompetitive examination?

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman from Minnesota has asked me the difference between a noncompetitive examination and a competitive examination. A noncompetitive examination requires a certain degree or type of examination calculated to determine in some degree at least the fitness of the holder of the position for the job. He does not compete with anyone else, and unless the Commission finds that he is incompetent to fill the job because he did not make a given grade he then may acquire a status under the civil service. A competitive examination is the rather extensive examination that is entered into by those who desire to be considered for the appointment in competition with other like persons. The three highest are certified, and then the selection is made from the three highest.

It is argued as against the competitive examination that too many people would fail. I think the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission indicated in his testimony that if we gave a competitive examination by this bill 75 percent of the incumbents in the jobs would be disqualified.

In connection with that I would like to say that as I heard the testimony and the arguments of those who are opposed to the competitive examination they were largely the arguments that will be made here by people who favor the patronage system as against the civil-service system; they were the arguments that it would cost too much money. They were the arguments that you cannot tell by an examination what the capabilities and abilities of a man are. They were the arguments of those who said that if we gave a competitive examination and a lot of people went out of jobs overnight, the service would be disrupted. As to disruption of the service, we went all through the last Congress on that basis, and then all at once the committee found that in the provisions of the bill, even if a person did not pass an examination, he would not necessarily lose his job; and the result has been a committee amendment which provides that if the person now holding the job does not pass a noncompetitive examination he shall be separated from the service at the end of 6 months.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. If it is a fact that 75 percent of the unclassified service fail to pass a competitive examination, it is quite evident that they are not fit to be in the Government service.

Mr. HALLECK. Of course, that suggestion has been made a good many times. I think, as a matter of fairness, that a person who has had one of these jobs and has experience of 3, 4, or 5 years, that person probably has some ability to do that job better than a new person coming in would have. I think that is elemental. I have always said that if competitive examinations are given credit should be given for experience. But, Mr. Speaker, if competitive examinations are right in the first instance, if we can tell by that examination who is the best person for the job, and if we want to improve the Government service by getting the best people in the job, then why should not competitive examinations be used here? I realize that there is political pressure and I realize that that sort of a bill might not get through, but I say we ought to meet this in principle and not in expediency, and meet it once for all.

Those of us who believe in the merit system are in a dilemma in respect to this bill. We would like to see a fair bill; we would like to see an extension of the civil-service system and the Classification Act; but the thing that disturbs us is this: Is this a fair bill? Is it the sort of a bill that represents an honest and equitable effort to extend the merit system in all government? If it is, then we ought to vote for it; but, if it is not, a vote against it should not be construed as a vote against a true merit-system extension. If, as may be most forcefully argued, it is designed to bring political appointees into the civil service, load up the civil service, give those people a preferred status which they can use if their agency goes out of existence in trying to get into some other job, and otherwise is not an application of the true merit system, then I say it is not a fair bill and we should not vote for it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLANNERY].

Mr. FLANNERY. Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter more personal than otherwise, and I ask the House to indulge me for 2 minutes.

An altercation has arisen in Pennsylvania about the W. P. A. administration, and that has been carried to the floor of this House. It was suggested here that in order to iron out the differences a conference be arranged of all parties in interest, and I suggested that the Governor of Pennsylvania, as one who had made the original charges of noncooperation, be invited. The Governor has seen fit in response to that to criticize me and attack me personally in his press conference. I merely want to comment briefly upon that. The Governor, apparently in response to my invitation, said that he wanted to go on record with reference to FLANNERY.

He said that in 1935 I was an ardent Republican and sought the Republican nomination for district attorney. I do not know just what bearing that would have on this were it true, but for the sake of the record I have been a registered Democrat all my life and I sought support for the Democratic nomination for district attorney in 1935. He further suggested that instead of finding fault with him I should try to do all I could for the men and women in Luzerne County on the W. P. A. I never found fault with the Governor, as the record will reveal, and I have been fighting for the help of the W. P. A. for Pennsylvania that the Governor says he wants, long before he entered the fray. Apparently the Governor lost his temper. It is unfortunate that he should have been led into making extravagant, intemperate personal remarks with respect to a matter that should be above personalities. I wish to make this observation. I do not believe that it is conducive to good if we go into the conference in the spirit of personal vengeance.

I trust the Governor will modify his attitude and approach this question in a calm, temperate, judicious manner as I have endeavored to do from the very beginning. This calls for statesmanship and cooperation—not abuse.

I thank you. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most important measures that has come before this Congress during this session.

This is not the real Ramspeck bill. The real Ramspeck bill provides for a competitive civil-service system. Most of the argument will resolve itself about that question. That is whether or not you are in favor of a real, honest, fair, competitive civil-service merit system, or whether this afternoon you want to again extend further power to the Chief Executive of this Nation and authorize him to blanket in, under noncompetitive examinations, some 300,000 politically appointed employees under your Government and mine—employees that the Congress of the United States deliberately kept out of civil service when they provided for the bureaus and commissions that are now being brought under this measure, if you see fit to vote for it.

This bill does not provide for a real, honest, fair competitive merit system. Oh, of course they tell you, "this has happened before." As far as I am concerned, this is not a political question. This measure should stand or fall on its merits, and I am saying to you that there never has been a time in any administration when an attempt has been made to place thousands of employees under a so-called civil-service plan. If you pass this bill this afternoon you are injuring that very thing. If you will study this measure you will be convinced of it.

Not very long ago the President appointed a very important committee or commission to investigate the civil-service problems. Two members of that committee are members of the Supreme Court; yet this afternoon, before the President's own committee has an opportunity to report on this question our distinguished leaders on the other side of the aisle see fit to bring this measure to the floor of the House. I assume that you will support the rule, but you ought to vote it down. It is not fair to Congress, it is not fair to the people of this country for you to say to some 300,000 people who secured their jobs by political patronage, "You are now entitled to come under the civil-service system and be entitled to the same rights and privileges as those thousands who are in there now, who acquired their jobs by competitive civil-service examinations."

It seems to me you might just as well wipe the thing off the books and be done with it if this is the manner in which you are going to conduct civil-service affairs of this country.

I am in favor of fair, competitive civil-service examinations. If you want to give credit to those employees who are in there now by reason of their experience, well and good. As a matter of fact I think it should be done. But are you going to say to some 4,000,000 young men and women graduates of colleges and high schools all over this country, who have not had permanent jobs at all, "No; you do not even have a chance or a right, under our democratic form of Government to even compete for these jobs, because the Congress this afternoon decided that 300,000 politically appointed people are entitled to those jobs and are entitled to keep them, not so much because they are qualified, but because of their political affiliations."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I will if I can have 1 more minute.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not true also that there are nearly 1,000,000 people on the eligible civil-service list, eligible for appointment in the Government, who are now unemployed by the Federal Government? Surely we are not keeping faith with them.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Oh, that is true. We have thousands of those people who have already passed civil-service examinations and whose names are on the list, but they tell us, "Oh, they did not qualify for these particular jobs." Most of them are stenographers and clerks of various kinds, but they say, "We cannot give them consideration because they took an examination for the jobs that are already under civil service." So we let them go by and say to the folks that are now in, "You keep your jobs because this legislation is for you." If they can qualify for the jobs, let them have them, but they ought to be willing to compete with the fellow on the outside. They should be glad to do it.

I hope you will see fit to vote down this rule and let the committee bring in a real civil-service bill. I would suggest that the distinguished chairman of our committee bring in a bill similar to the one he recommended to this House 2 years ago. It was known as H. R. 2700 and provided for a competitive civil service merit system. [Applause.]

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS].

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that a majority of this House will vote for the passage of this bill. Believing that, I can see no reason why we should take up the time of the House in consideration of a bill when the same end can be attained by defeating the rule immediately.

I want to read a portion of the first section of this bill:

That notwithstanding any provisions of law to the contrary, the President is authorized by Executive order to cover into the classified civil service any offices or positions in or under an executive department, independent establishment, or other agency of the Government.

The whole field, if you please. Finally, at the end of section 1, it does except the W. P. A.

This House has on many occasions reversed itself, of course, but since I have been here we have passed bills which by positive provision we said, "Jobs under this agency must be selected without regard to the Civil Service Act."

Now, if you pass this bill you wipe out every such provision that you, by your vote, put into a bill.

I have been accused on the floor of this House of being a spoilsman. That has never scared me. I think that under any system where a man is compelled to hold his position upon his ability to discharge the responsibilities of the position is a better system than a cloak of protection thrown around inefficiency. But, if I am a spoilsman, then I should be for this bill because the woods down in my district are full of good men holding positions in different Federal agencies by reason of my recommendation. If I just wanted to be selfish, and had no other reason, I would vote for this bill, but I am not going to. I know there is more inefficiency by reason of civil service in this Government than by any other reason. [Applause.] I know that honest, conscientious, civil-service employees will know that I am telling the truth when I say that a man under civil service who wants to do a day's work generally is hindered by the drones and hold-backs who discharge their duties inefficiently. This system which protects inefficiency should not be extended, to all departments of Government; rather we should adopt a system which would compel an honest and an efficient day's work, or discharge from the Government service.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I have very limited time; I cannot yield.

A very interesting article appeared in this morning's Times-Herald. It is headed "Hoover registers a point."

I quote:

F. B. I.'s Director, J. Edgar Hoover, has raised the charge of incompetence against the Civil Service Commission and the system of competitive selection of personnel under the Commission. * * *

Hoover's charges are based on what he has said he has found to be the facts in cases less than 1 year old. He recounts that a woman employed in the Federal service applied for a job as typist and was certified February 1939. Hoover found she suffered hallucinations and delusions. Once she threatened to kill fellow employees with a pistol. Last July she was the object of an insanity complaint.

He found further that a convicted forger was certified to F. B. I. Another was an admitted Communist Party member (August 1939). He sought to be a fingerprint classifier. He concludes by saying: "* * * I think even the Civil Service Commission will admit that our procedure of selection and our merit system today is certainly as good as, if not better, than theirs. We have had no instances of scandals or corruption or inefficiency."

The present civil service is not a merit system. There is no provision in the present civil-service law which is carried out that compels people working under civil service to maintain a constant line of efficiency, and I challenge the record to show instances—there may be a few segregated ones—but I challenge the record to show where any person has ever been discharged from a civil-service position by reason of inefficiency, or their inability to do the job. [Applause.]

I think this rule ought to be defeated.

I am for a merit system and I would wholeheartedly support a bill, the purpose of which was to revise the present civil-service system so that it would become a merit system, by compelling that employees enjoying the protection of civil service would be required to maintain a constant line of efficiency, and if they fell a certain distance below that constant line that they should be automatically discharged and their promotion and advancement in salary should be gaged by the distance that they were able to go above by constant line of efficiency. A person takes examination, either competitive or noncompetitive, and has civil-service status. Under existing law, after that first examination there is never any other examination given to ascertain whether or not they have remained as well qualified to hold the position as they were qualified at the time it was given to them. This applies as well to physical as mental examinations. I am perfectly willing that Government employees should be given some protection but I have always contended that they should first be compelled to maintain a certain standard that they were entitled to that protection.

There are many fine, conscientious people employed by the Federal Government under civil-service status, but it is my studied judgment that much of their work is hampered and that the offices in which they are working are reduced to a point of inefficiency, despite their good work, by those surrounding them who are content to do as little as possible and slumber secure in their cloak of protection furnished by their civil-service status.

Drones in the civil service will not like this statement. Those who are honest, conscientious, hard working, even though they have civil-service status, will in their own heart, if they do not publicly, agree with this position.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOSER].

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, I have a personal feeling somewhat of regret to come before my colleagues in opposition to a rule presumably well-considered by the Committee on Rules and brought here, because it is a committee that has my supreme confidence; yet I feel that the exigencies arising in this instance are such that I should oppose it. I advocate the rejection of the rule as the shortest method out of a bad situation.

I need not repeat that I am a typical product of the open competitive merit system of civil-service examination. I would rather confine myself to a bit of the history concerning this legislation. When I became a member of the House Committee on the Civil Service, our distinguished chairman had before it his bill, H. R. 2700, that embodied and dignified the idealism I had always associated with civil service for open competitive examination. I supported that bill wholeheartedly.

Among those who came before the committee to testify in opposition to the bill was Kenneth Vipond, of the Civil Service Commission; and when he was questioned, but questioned under my cross-examination as a witness, I drew out from him some of the very self-same evidence which was brought before this House through the Appropriations Committee 2 days ago and broadcast to the Nation in a coast-to-coast hook-up, and which was just referred to by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS]. He testified that they would certify an ex-convict. He testified that they would certify such a man on the ground that he had made amends for his crime; that he considered the man had wiped out his offense against society and should be given a chance to make good. He testified that he would certify a man who had been arrested for and even convicted of a felony, in response to questionings by our late colleague the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURLEY].

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], speaking with respect to the number who would fail in an open competitive examination, was doubtless quoting President Mitchell, of the Civil Service Commission, who estimated that only 20 to 25 percent would pass. An instance to which the gentleman did not refer was definite testimony before the committee with respect to the examination for the alcohol-tax unit. Mr. Vipond said the Congress did not hold that unit in high esteem and ordered by legislation an open competitive examination. He stated further that 65 percent of those people failed. I believe the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] will remember that.

In addition to the testimony before the Appropriations Committee by J. Edgar Hoover, may I say that the Civil Service Commission has certified to the Post Office Department for appointment as postmaster in my district, and remains adamant in its position, a woman who has been actively identified with every Communist Front movement that has been in operation in my district, leading up to my projected kidnaping. I protested and made the statement to the Commission that under all civil-service law I ever knew and understood, they could not justify a rating of 78 percent for business training and experience for that candidate, when over a 5-month period prior to certification, according to photostatic copies of resolutions I turned over to the Civil Service Commission, referring the originals to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, her activities were devoted to such communistic energies. Exactly the same statement that J. Edgar Hoover used, "We must accept them," is the evidence in my files from the Civil Service Commission in a case in kind. I maintain that a member of an organization advocating the overthrow of the Government of the United States, which I have come here and have sworn to uphold under the Constitution, should not be named and certified to the Post Office Department to consider for postmaster or any kind of a position of profit or honor under the Government of the United States under any circumstances.

With respect to the merits of this bill, there is so much I could talk about that I could talk on indefinitely. In the limited amount of time allotted to me, I feel I should not impose upon you, but I do want to say there is not a single phase of it I could not oppose on some civil-service ground. I do believe in the merit system. I have advocated it. It was my opportunity. I believe in the merit system honestly applied, under civil-service law, but I do not believe in the philosophy stated by some opponents of this bill, any more than I find it possible to agree with its proponents. I do not believe a Member of Congress is less able and qualified to select somebody that possesses sufficient merit to take a position that may be available to him under the patronage system. I do not believe he or she is less able to do that than the type of Civil Service Commission that is administering examinations such as I have decried, and such as is described by J. Edgar Hoover.

I wish I could go on and cite personal instances. I do want to bring to your attention an assertion that has been bandied about this House that the President had stated on the 3d of January that he favors the extension of this alleged type of merit system. I leave it to all my colleagues who heard it here. The President of the United States, from this rostrum, named among other ideals an extension of the merit system, but he did not under any circumstances advocate the adoption of this particular type of legislation, which, as has been so ably stated by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] circumvents and sets aside previous acts of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding. The President has said to me that "This Nation is still on a competitive basis," agreeing with me that competition is still the life of trade.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this omnibus bill, H. R. 960, is a tremendously important bill, and I think the rule should be voted down. I have been a member of the Civil Service Committee for a longer period than any other member now on the committee, and I have always supported the merit system in the civil-service measures. Personally, I have always followed the civil-service rules in my appointments to Annapolis, in my appointments to West Point, and in the appointment of postmasters. I have always taken the first man on the list. I am heartily in favor of open competitive examinations. I believe in the merit system.

Mr. Speaker, I want to bring before the House in the brief time allotted me a most vital matter. Yesterday we spent a great deal of time arguing and voting against an appropriation for our United States representatives in Soviet Russia. We do not like what goes on in communistic, atheistic Russia. We have thousands of fine workers on our temporary rolls, but do you realize that among them we have employed by our Government today certain Communists and certain persons who are hostile to our form of government? I do not believe we should take those people into the permanent employment of our Government or into the civil service and include them in our great army of Government workers wherein should be found only the finest type of people, men and women who are ready to defend the country. We should not employ people who are only willing to go into our navy yards, for instance, and into our various departments to get information that may be used against this country. A great deal of time should be spent in investigating the character and activities of those who have entered or who are to enter our Government service. We shall have only ourselves to blame if we freeze into our Government those who should not be there. The harm will be done after it is too late.

Mr. Speaker, I earnestly hope we will take plenty of time before passing a bill of this sort. [Applause.]

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of the time on this side.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania raised a question as to the accuracy of the figures cited by me with reference to the estimated percentage of present employees who would probably be separated from the service or who would fail under a competitive examination. It is not very important, because there was not a great difference in the estimated percentage. However, you will find a statement by Mr. Mitchell, President of the Civil Service Commission, on page 3 of the hearings, in which he indicated that there was not much upon which to base an estimate, but he would say, roughly, that only 20 to 25 percent would retain their positions under a competitive examination.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK], the author of this bill.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I want to clear up a few things in the beginning that have been said by preceding speakers which did not clearly reflect the facts. Reference has been made to the Reed committee, and the impression left, through misunderstanding, I am sure, that the Reed committee is studying the question of bringing into the civil service employees that would be affected by this bill, which is not a correct statement of the purposes of the Reed committee. That committee is making a study of whether or not the President should be advised to bring into the civil service lawyers and technical employees whom he now has authority to bring in, an entirely different subject from that covered by the pending bill.

Mr. Speaker, our friends on the Republican side who are so pious this afternoon about the sanctity of the competitive examination had no hesitancy here in the regular session last year in voting these so-called patronage employees under the Hatch bill so that the Democratic politicians could not use them. My friend the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], for whom I have the highest regard, voted against recommitment of the bill and in favor of its final passage, as did my friend the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] and the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Just for a question.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Does not the gentleman believe that was a good vote?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; I voted the same way; but let us be consistent about it. Why does the gentleman quibble now about putting these people under the civil-service system so that the merit system can be carried out and the employees can be appointed hereafter by the competitive system? The gentleman acknowledges by his inconsistency that the thing he is interested in is the political question, and you hope you may hold them where you can replace them after the election in 1940. [Applause.]

Mr. REES of Kansas. There is nothing inconsistent about having them take competitive examinations.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Now I wish to go further with the question of competitive or noncompetitive examination. The evidence taken before the committee on this bill shows that the president of the Civil Service Commission, the executive director of it, and the other officials testified there is no difference between a competitive and a noncompetitive examination insofar as the contents of the examination are concerned. The only difference is that the person taking the examination on a noncompetitive basis has to make only 70 points to qualify, whereas if he is in competition his chance of getting a position depends on his relative standing in comparison with the others with whom he competes. The contents of the examination are exactly the same.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I am sorry; I cannot yield. I do not have much time.

It is true that in the Seventy-fifth Congress I introduced a similar bill containing a provision for competitive examinations. We held exhaustive hearings on that bill. I could not get any support from anybody for the theory of competitive examinations. It was testified that it would disrupt the services of these agencies and that it would cost from $6,000,000 to $8,000,000 to hold the examinations. All witnesses who appeared before the committee contended that the only practical way to bring these employees under the merit system was by the noncompetitive system.

I call your attention to the fact that later during the Seventy-fifth Congress the President's Committee on Administrative Management reported and recommended the extension of the civil service upward, outward, and downward. A bill was brought in, reported by the House Committee on Reorganization, containing exactly in substance what this bill contains now. The reorganization bill on which we voted in 1938 and for which many of you on both sides of the aisle voted, contained in substance exactly what this bill proposes to do, to bring these positions under the merit system by noncompetitive examination.

I wish now to mention the charges made here in the name of J. Edgar Hoover. May I say that I have the highest respect for Mr. Hoover as Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. I believe in many respects he has done an outstanding job. However, Mr. Hoover does not believe in civil service. He believes as little in it as my friend the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS], who has just confessed to you that he does not believe in it at all.

Mr. Hoover has had a free hand in the Bureau of Investigation with the exception of the position of fingerprint classifiers. The Commission entered into an agreement with Mr. Hoover that he would do his own character investigation; yet he comes out and charges the Commission with certifying to him people with bad character, when he knows and has failed to disclose publicly the fact that it was done because he had agreed he would rather have his own employees make the character investigations, which otherwise would have been made by employees of the Commission.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICHOLS. Is not the gentleman mistaken in this, that insofar as the fingerprint employees are concerned they are certified by the Civil Service Commission, and all other employees are selected by Mr. Hoover's force?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct. That is what I said.

Mr. NICHOLS. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The employees referred to in the article from which the gentleman read are the only employees that are under civil service in the Bureau of Investigation. They are fingerprint classifiers. By agreement with the Commission Mr. Hoover was to investigate them himself. Of course, they are certified to him without investigation because the agreement was made that he would investigate them with his own people. Yet he turns around and criticizes the Commission for carrying out this agreement with him. I say it is an unfair criticism made by him to create prejudice against the civil service in the F. B. I.

I shall go further than that, since this question has been raised. Last year Mr. Hoover appeared before the subcommittee which has just left this floor this afternoon and, off the record, according to the statement made to me by the chairman of the subcommittee himself, charged the Civil Service Commission with sending white applicants to colored doctors for physical examination. There is not a word of truth in it because the Commission has no doctors. I think Mr. Hoover made that statement off the record to prejudice that committee, which was composed primarily of men from the South. It was a dastardly thing for him to do, and he ought not to have done it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. As we all know, the Civil Service Commission has two Democrats and one Republican composing its membership.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Is it not a fact that the Republican member of the Commission joined with the two Democratic members in a favorable report on the legislation now about to be brought to the floor, we hope?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct. As a matter of fact, in the history of this legislation three Republican members, Dr. Leonard White, of Illinois, Mr. Samuel Ordway, of New York, and the present Commissioner, Mr. Fleming, who has recently been appointed, have endorsed this legislation.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. The gentleman understands my interest in the special-delivery messengers?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. DINGELL. I wish to say before I ask my question that I am for the bill as is. I have implicit confidence in the gentleman's sincerity and his ability to bring out the right kind of a bill here to bring about civil service. However, I should like to know whether at some future and early date we might not try to solve the problem affecting some 3,000 employees in the special-delivery department.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman knows my interest in that matter and my willingness to cooperate with him. I do not want to take up more time on that now, please, because it is not involved in this bill. As a matter of fact, they are not now Government employees. They are on a contract or fee basis.

Mr. DINGELL. I hope we may get together with the gentleman later on that proposition.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do want to point out to the House that this bill will affect deputy collectors of internal revenue, deputy United States marshals, and various other employees, some of whom have been in the Government service for 20 years, and I hope the House will vote for this rule.

There are a great many questions that have been raised here that I cannot attempt to answer in the short time I have on the rule, but I think I can show to the satisfaction of the membership of this House that there is only one question involved here, and that is the question of whether or not you want to give these people who are already employed and who have rendered faithful service for several years a chance to have a civil-service status and inject them, so to speak, into the blood stream of the civil-service system.

Now, this is the real reason my friends on the Republican side are opposed to this bill. They do not want these Democratic appointees to have any chance to transfer into the old-line agencies if these emergency agencies, so-called, fold up and go out of business.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CREAL. The gentleman from Oklahoma did not yield, but he pointed out that numerous bills have been passed by the Congress whereby employees might be taken in without regard to civil service, but he forgot to admit that the Republicans voted against nearly every one of those bills and are now inconsistent and voting against themselves on that same proposition which is to take them by civil service hereafter.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Does not the gentleman feel that the point that has been made about the alleged employment of foreign agents and people who believe in the overthrow of the Government by force is entirely beside the point? As I remember it, we passed an amendment to the so-called Hatch bill which forbade the employment of such people by the Government, and it is now against the law. The problem is to find out who or where such people are.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct. The Civil Service Commission does not permit an alien to stand a civil-service examination and has not for a long time.

The charge made here by my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOSER] that they certified Communists, I do not know anything about, and, of course, I could not answer unless I knew a specific case, but I do know this: They would not insist upon the appointment—and they have so stated in writing—of any person who advocated the overthrow of this Government by force. We have not any law in this country that keeps a man from believing in communism if he advocates the achievement of it by parliamentary methods, and while I do not approve of his believing in that, I think, under our constitutional system, nobody here would dispute his right under the Constitution to freedom of expression so long as he advocates it by parliamentary methods, and we have no law that would authorize the Civil Service Commission to refrain from certifying any person who passes the examination, and we have no law, if you leave them outside of civil service, to prevent the employment of people who actually advocate the overthrow of government by force.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. NICHOLS. I want to ask my friend from Georgia a question. The gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] has just called attention to the fact that by amendment to the Hatch bill it was provided that no one could be employed by the Federal Government who advocated the overthrow of this Government.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. NICHOLS. My friend from Georgia qualifies that by saying that it must be by force. I want to call the attention of my friend from Georgia to the fact that the amendment to the Hatch bill did not say "by force," but said "who advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government." That happened to be my amendment, and I know what it provides.

Mr. RAMSPECK. If that is correct, of course, the gentleman is right in assuming we cannot employ anybody who does that, whether he is under civil service or outside of civil service. He would not be eligible under civil service, and therefore all this argument about them certifying such people is beside the point. In the Committee of the Whole I expect to show the widespread support of this bill. It has the active support of all labor organizations, the National League of Women Voters, the National Civil Service Reform League, the Business and Professional Women, the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce, and many others.

The bill carries out the platforms of both major political parties and the request of the President.

I expect to show by history that the Republicans not only did not use competitive examinations when they were in power—with one exception—but they blanketed employees in without any examination. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAMSPECK) there were—ayes 70, noes 96.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 214, nays 122, answered "present" 1, not voting 84, as follows:

THE WHEELER-LEA TRANSPORTATION BILL

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, sometime ago there was introduced in the House a bill titled the "Wheeler-Lea transportation bill." After listening to the debate on both sides of the House we find that there is a consolidation feature connected to this bill. I, along with a great many Members of this House, am deeply concerned about the omnibus transportation bill as passed in different forms by both the Senate and the House.

Railroad employees have been told that this is not consolidation legislation, that it will not bring about widespread consolidation of the railroads, and that even if it does the bill gives adequate protection to railroad workers. I have contended with the gentleman from Iowa, VINC HARRINGTON, author of the Harrington amendment, from the beginning that it is consolidation legislation and that it will bring about widespread railroad consolidation, resulting in the creation of ghost communities and throwing into breadlines over 200,000 railway employees, and that no adequate protection is afforded the employees; that the bill is designed to give the railroad bankers a free rein in the consolidation procedure, subject only to the graces of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and accordingly the enactment of this legislation will mean that the Congress has abdicated to the railroad bankers and the Interstate Commerce Commission by delegating the authority to consolidate railroads, without imposing any just and adequate standards for the protection of the traveling and shipping public and railway employees.

The Association of American Railroads declared that this bill will facilitate railroad consolidation. Now, we read in the Wall Street Journal of January 17, 1930, in which it is stated that—

The Interstate Commerce Commission anticipates renewed activity toward railroad consolidation, and is hopeful that the pending carrier legislation liberalizes the merger provisions and will stimulate the trend.

I am at a loss to understand the testimony of Mr. George M. Harrison, a member of the Commitee of Six, chairman of the Railroad Executive Association, and an exceptionally pleasant and good leader. I am at a loss to understand his testimony before the committee when he knew or must have known that the consolidation feature was in this piece of legislation, and if so, that it would mean placing 200,000 to 225,000 railroad employees upon the relief rolls. Yet he says this—and I am quoting from George M. Harrison:

Through consolidation we will get a greater amount of economies, undoubtedly get rid of the weak lines that are now presenting a serious problem and do much to strengthen the rail-transportation industry. Now, if our recommendations in that direction are adopted, we are firmly convinced that there undoubtedly will be a great many consolidations, whereby the transportation industry, with particular reference to the railroads, can be strengthened. There is no good in a consolidation unless it has the effect of strengthening the financial ability and reducing the amount of burdens that are placed upon the industry.

I am quoting Mr. Harrison, which you will find in H. R. 2531, pages 213 and 214.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I am happy to yield to my good friend, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HARRINGTON].

Mr. HARRINGTON. Is it not a fact that under the omnibus transporation bill consolidations of railroads, particularly the weaker railroads, would be most effective?

Mr. SCHULTE. Absolutely. That is true.

Mr. HARRINGTON. And it also follows, therefore, if that is the case, that the employees of the weaker railroads will be thrown out of work?

Mr. SCHULTE. There is no question about that, and that is irrespective of the length of service they have rendered to that particular railroad. And that is where a lot of the savings will come from, the salary of the employees.

Mr. HARRINGTON. And in spite of the Railroad Retirement Act?

Mr. SCHULTE. That is right.

Now, it is not being honest with the railroad employees to contend that the omnibus transportation bill does not have as one of its major purposes the expediting of widespread consolidation of American railroads in the interest of improving profits. Now, it is not in the interest of the people by any means, because in spite of the consolidations we have had in the United States, there is not anyone who can show us where there has been a 5-cent saving to the user of that particular railroad.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. GEYER of California. What does the gentleman think about squeezing the water out first before they begin jumping on the employees?

Mr. SCHULTE. I am very much in sympathy with that and am anxious that that be accomplished first. I have repeatedly said that a consolidation program will add from 200,000 to 225,000 railroad workers to the ranks of the unemployed. Now, is this a fact? Is this an overstatement? I submit the following from the Wall Street Journal of January 7, 1940. Evidently that speaks for big business.

The savings of wages, the main purpose of mergers, and the increase in efficiency in consolidation probably would be substantial. Estimates have been made that if all of the possible or logical consolidations and coordinations were an accomplished fact, savings in railroad operations of as much as $500,000,000 annually could be brought about.

It is reliably estimated that 80 percent of the savings from consolidations will come out of the pay rolls of railroad workers. Eighty percent of $500,000,000 is $400,000,000. According to the official records of the Railroad Retirement Board, based on the wages actually received by the total number of workers actually employed, the average annual wage of railroad workers in 1937 was $1,108. According to the middle-of-the-month count of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the average annual wage was $1,781, but it should be understood that this is a fictitious figure and not the true annual average wage. Consolidations would naturally eliminate the part-time employees first, so if we are to arrive at an accurate estimate of the total number of employees eliminated by railroad consolidations, the Retirement Board estimate, which includes all workers employed by the industry, would give us the most accurate result. Considering $1,108 as the average annual wage of railroad workers, the $400,000,000 annual take from railroad labor would eliminate 361,000 employees. Even if we used the fictitious average annual wage used by railroad and financial interests, 224,593 employees would be eliminated. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is in spite of millions upon millions of dollars that this particular Administration has spent in trying to relieve unemployment.

I ask the membership of the House: Are you going to take part in passing this so-called Wheeler-Lea transportation bill which is going to throw 361,000 railroad employees on the street with no compensation whatsoever for the time they have put in, with no help whatsoever and no savings to the consumers or the users of the railroad?

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Under the Senate bill the statement the gentleman has made is absolutely correct, but is it not true that under the House bill, which is in conference, railroad labor has been protected?

Mr. SCHULTE. If the House would adopt the amendment which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HARRINGTON] offered, that would be true. That is the only thing that will save the railroad employees, the Harrington amendment; and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that when this bill comes back from conference, if the Harrington amendment is eliminated, the thing which offers the only solution to this problem, then we should vote down the complete Wheeler-Lea transportation bill, for it does not mean any savings to the people of this country. [Applause.]

We have every reason to rely upon the Wall Street Journal's estimate of the contemplated savings, for the omnibus transportation bill proposes to give to the railroads and their bankers the initiative in railroad consolidations. The Wall Street Journal of January 2 this year states that this legislation would give back to the railroads initiative on consolidation proposals.

In Mr. Harrison's testimony which I have cited earlier in my remarks, he declared that the reason they were asking for repeal of the 1920 Transportation Act was to get rid of the uncertainty of Government action and the danger of having some governmental officer without practical experience, perhaps, trying to lay out the physical operations of the railways—in other words to give the railroads a free hand in consolidations. That is what they are asking us for.

This bill is also defended on the grounds that the so-called Washington jobs agreement of 1936 will protect the railway employees. If you permanently disemploy a quarter of a million railroad workers, somebody must absorb that pay roll loss. In the hearings above referred to, Mr. George M. Harrison declared that the entire economies possible from the 1936 Washington jobs agreement will be absorbed by labor for the first year and a half and thereafter it will accrue to the corporations.

Mr. Speaker, let me say that in the event the Wheeler-Lea bill becomes law it means that in every city, every little town, irrespective of its location in the United States, where railroad men live today, one-half of the railroad men living there will be unemployed. Let us see how the railroads have progressed. Who is causing all this unemployment in the railroad field? Twenty years ago the railroads employed over 2,000,000 men. Two million men were making their living on the railroads. Today there are but 900,000 railroad employees in the United States, yet the railroads are moving more freight today than they did in 1920. This means that just 1,100,000 railroad men have lost their jobs because of improved conditions in the railroads, engines now pulling 100 cars, trains moving faster, yet railroad rates are higher today than they have ever been. Where is the saving to the public? Are we going to continue to be a part of this and allow them to do all this consolidating? I hope not.

Let me now pay tribute to our colleague in the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HARRINGTON]. He saw this coming and used every effort to protect the railroad men. His every heart beat is in sympathy with them. The gentleman from Iowa appreciating the fact that it would mean unemployment in spite of what the railroad executives said, introduced the Harrington amendment. They say the Harrington amendment is harmless. If it is harmless why not adopt it?

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. If the Harrington amendment stays in the bill the wholesale dismissal of railroad workers will not occur.

Mr. SCHULTE. It is the only safeguard the railroad men have, I may say to my good friend from Massachusetts; the Harrington amendment is their only safeguard.

Who is going to pay the cost of this threatened destruction of the jobs of a quarter of a million railroad workers? It is obvious that railroad workers and public relief agencies will absorb the loss, much to the profit of railroad financial interests. Let it further be recorded that railroad workers believe that a dismissal wage is no just substitute for a job. They want the right to work, not to be forced to surrender their jobs for a pittance. Following the signing of the Washington jobs agreement of May 21, 1936, I said the following of this agreement:

* * * I want to emphasize that, so far as the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen is concerned, the agreement with the carriers relative to consolidation and coordination can in no sense be interpreted to mean that the way is clear for railroad consolidations and coordination. This brotherhood will continue to fight as vigorously as it always has such efforts to economize at the expense of humanity. * * * We have now entered into an agreement with the carriers designed, not to improve the standards of living or working conditions of railroad workers, but to share with them a small portion of the booty that would come to the coupon clippers if Wall Street's demand for "economy" at the expense of humanity is carried out.

That is our position today. That is the position of the rank and file of all classes of railroad workers today. Congress would break faith with a million railroad workers if it used the Washington jobs agreement as a flimsy excuse for turning over to railroad bankers and the Interstate Commerce Commission our only mass transportation agency for the purpose of impairing it through consolidation for greater banker profits. Furthermore, you would be breaking faith with the millions of people who depend upon the railroads in small communities throughout the Nation. As quoted herein, Mr. George M. Harrison declared that this proposed legislation would "undoubtedly get rid of the weak lines," but I submit that the people who are dependent upon these weak lines for their means of livelihood, small-business men as well as railroad workers, consider the "weak lines" just as indispensable to their community life as the financially strong railroads.

No one can intelligently consider the problems of the railroad industry without understanding that that industry is characterized by "feast and famine." There are bankrupt railroads and railroads in an unsound financial condition—largely so because they have been milked by the rich and powerful railroads and by railroad bankers. But there are also railroads that are among the best dividend-paying corporations in the Nation. In 1936 the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad paid more in dividends than it paid in wages to its employees. As recently as 1936 the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad paid 1,100 percent dividends. It also paid 1,100 percent dividends in 1931, the year prior to the railway-wage deduction. The Senate financial investigation of the railroads revealed that this industry is wasting a million dollars a day. It has been estimated that if the Government took over the railroads and paid a fair return to the security holders on the true value of the present investment $500,000,000 in dividend and interest charges could be saved annually. The Wall Street Journal is interested in saving $500,000,000 annually in the railroad industry. So am I, but I think the savings should come from those who are responsible for the present condition of the industry and not by deflating communities throughout the Nation, aggravating our unemployment and general economic problems, and imposing the burden upon the innocent and those least able to bear it. That is the issue presented by this legislation.

In view of present economic conditions in this country, the Congress simply must not enact legislation that will cause great unemployment throughout the Nation. The economic efforts of adding a quarter of a million railroad workers to the ranks of the unemployed, reaching as it would down into almost every community throughout the Nation, with its consequent creation of ghost communities and deflation of business on a Nation-wide scale, is fraught with imponderable disaster. When we consider the past record of financial exploitation in the railroad industry, and realize that the omnibus transportation bill is proposing to turn over to the very financial interests that have plundered the railroads the "initiative" and encouragement to launch this deflationary consolidation program in the interests of banker profits, in an industry that admittedly is wasting $365,000,000 annually, mainly as a result of the policies of these financiers, it is unthinkable that any Congressman or Senator would favor it.

The Harrington amendment to the omnibus transportation bill, enacted by the House, effectively guards the people against this ominous threat to their prosperity and welfare. The amendment is as follows:

Provided, however, That no such transaction (consolidation, merger, purchase, lease, operating contract, or acquisition of control) shall be approved by the Commission if such transaction will result in unemployment or displacement of employees of the carrier or carriers, or in the impairment of existing employment rights of said employees.

All classes of railroad employees, various civic, fraternal, professional, and business groups have signed petitions in favor of the Harrington amendment. Many city councils and local officials throughout the Nation have signed these petitions. The people generally, and the rank and file of railroad employees in particular, do not want this disastrous program of railroad consolidation. So far as I know, or have been able to ascertain, not a single representative of organized labor, including the railroad labor groups, has ever spoken one word against the Harrington amendment. No railroad worker, and no one dependent upon the railroads for their means of livelihood and their community life, except railroad bankers, could oppose the Harrington amendment.

As a Member of this House, I urge you to retain the Harrington amendment when the conference report comes in. It would be far better for the country and for railroad workers if you would report out no recommendations than to recommend transportation legislation that did not contain this amendment. If this bill should ever become a law without the Harrington amendment, and railroad bankers should launch their program of eliminating a quarter of a million railroad workers, with consequent disastrous effects upon communities throughout the land, I assure you the Congress will soon have discovered that it has not solved the railroad problem, for the Nation-wide protest against this program of Wall Street railroad consolidation will compel a new and more equitable solution of our transportation problems.

Mr. PITTENGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. PITTENGER. Has the gentleman any assurances from the committee that we will have ample time to discuss this conference report when it comes in so that we may examine these different features?

Mr. SCHULTE. May I say to the gentleman that the proper thing to do in the House is to insist on proper time to debate the matter when 225,000 jobs are at stake. It is a mighty serious thing, and we ought to debate it. In spite of what we hear from some of the railroad executives, Mr. Whitney, of the Trainmen, is very much in sympathy with it, the rank and file and the people themselves, the members of these unions, are in sympathy with it. I talked with the railroad engineers and firemen, and they want the Harrington amendment. In fact, they insist on the Harrington amendment. The conductors in my district insist on the Harrington amendment. The railroad workers, track men, and others insist on the Harrington amendment. They are beginning to realize that this is no more than a camouflage, which gives the railroads the right to consolidate and eliminate 225,000 jobs and certainly we are not going to be a party to that.

Mr. LEA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield to my good friend from California, whom I regard very highly, and one of the most capable men in this House.

Mr. LEA. I understood the gentleman to say that the passage of this bill would mean the elimination of 225,000 workers?

Mr. SCHULTE. I say not less than that number.

Mr. LEA. There is not the slightest basis for any such statement.

Mr. SCHULTE. Oh, but I say that there is. Will the gentleman accept the Harrington amendment?

Mr. LEA. I am not in position to accept it.

Mr. SCHULTE. Will the gentleman help us to have it accepted?

Mr. LEA. This is a question of abandonment or consolidation. Now, consolidation aids labor while abandonment destroys labor. It is not a question of choice. It is a question of what we actually face.

Mr. SCHULTE. I differ with my good friend the gentleman from California. I know he is sincere in his desire, and so am I. I am not willing, however, to gamble with 225,000 jobs. If there is not to be any damage to the railroad men, why not accept the Harrington amendment? It is not going to hurt the bill, and we are safeguarding those who believe the same as we do.

Mr. LEA. I am confident in my belief that the Harrington amendment will not help labor. It would stand in the way of consolidation. Consolidations aid labor by keeping up lines that otherwise will have to be abandoned. Of course, it is a debatable question. No one can tell you that any particular labor or any particular number are going to lose their employment because of consolidations. Consolidations require, in the first place, the consent of the lines affected, a very difficult thing, on account of the matter of refinancing and other problems. It is very difficult to make consolidations. In the next place, no consolidation can be made unless it has the approval of the Commission.

Mr. SCHULTE. May I say to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] that the question is too serious, it is too vital for either him or me to argue about. The point I make is that, knowing the railroad operators of the past and knowing the tricks to which they have resorted, I am not going to gamble when 225,000 jobs are at stake.

Mr. LEA. The principal labor organizations entered into an agreement with practically all the railroad companies providing for the care of men who might be displaced on account of consolidations. In a recent decision of the Supreme Court, the right of the Interstate Commerce Commission to require such an arrangement was established. In that particular case it was estimated that the savings per year would be about $500,000, and about $300,000 of that benefit went directly to labor. That had to do with one consolidation. Out of an estimated $500,000 saving, labor received over $300,000 of the benefit from the railroad company because of their displacement or transfer of employment.

Mr. SCHULTE. Allow me to say that the gentleman has admitted consolidations do enter into this.

Mr. LEA. In the bill?

Mr. SCHULTE. Yes.

Mr. LEA. Oh, yes; no doubt about that.

Mr. SCHULTE. There is no difference between us in reference to the consolidation feature being in the bill. The railroad men were told, and it is their general belief, that there is no consolidation connected with the Wheeler-Lea transportation bill.

Mr. LEA. If they would look up the arguments had in this House, I called attention to that as being one of the important features of the bill in the very first statement I made.

Mr. SCHULTE. It does allow the railroads to consolidate?

Mr. LEA. Yes; with the approval of the Commission.

Mr. SCHULTE. I am happy the gentleman has given us that contribution and that he has assured us beyond doubt that there is the matter of consolidation in this bill.

Now, who has asked for the bill? Agriculture has not asked for it. Agriculture testified in opposition to the bill, realizing the damage it will do to agriculture in connection with its shipping. The War Department does not want the bill, as was testified by the Secretary of War. Labor does not want the bill. Well, who wants the bill? Certainly the consumers of the United States do not want the bill, because they realize what is going to happen to them in the event the bill passes. So who can it be? It must be the railroad interests, and for the sole purpose of consolidation. I reiterate the statement it will eliminate 225,000 railroad workers who have served the railroads anywhere from 5 days to 30 years. These workers are going to be thrown on the mercy of the people of the towns in which they live. There is no denial of that, there is no question about it, from the treatment that has been accorded railroad men in the past by the railroads.

Mr. LEA. Under the present operations about 900,000 men who were formerly employed by the railroads have lost their positions.

Mr. SCHULTE. In the last 20 years, I may say to the gentleman, the railroad men inform us that over a million men have lost their jobs.

Mr. LEA. Yes; but about a hundred thousand have been taken back. Now, does not the gentleman think the laboring man is interested as well as the railroads in restoring a wholesome condition in the railroad industry?

The laboring man cannot hope to draw his salary from the railroad unless the railroad itself is a going concern.

Mr. SCHULTE. May I say to the gentleman from California that there is no question about that, and the railroads have been very amply protected in the past 50 years.

Mr. LEA. There has been a great demand and support for this legislation by the men themselves. Practically an overwhelming majority of the employees of the railroads of the United States want this legislation for the same reason that the railroads need it.

Mr. SCHULTE. The Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, and that is the largest body that belongs to the 21 brotherhoods, is very much opposed to the bill. May I say also that the railroad engineers and firemen who live in my district are opposed to it. The Order of Railway Conductors in my district is opposed to it. The railway men who maintain the tracks are opposed to it because their eyes have been opened to the fact that it means the loss of half of their jobs. They realize and appreciate that fact.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Does the gentleman know what are some of the various circumstances that might cause the brotherhoods in various districts to differ in their opinions as to what effect this legislation will have on the workingmen?

Mr. SCHULTE. Yes, absolutely; through the leadership of the various organizations. The leaders who have gone into this bill and who are very much in sympathy with their men, and honest in trying to keep their men at work, are for the Harrington amendment. This is a very broad statement I am making. I predict here and now that in the event this bill passes without the Harrington amendment every one of these railroad leaders who have been opposing the Harrington amendment will be dethroned or dehorned, as they call it in the parlance of the railroad world.

I say to the Members of this House that if the Wheeler-Lea bill passes it will not mean a saving to the consumers or the users of the railroads. What the railroads are trying to do is eliminate all forms of competition, to continue the dog-in-the-manger attitude they have had for 20 years. They have finally lost it because of the competition of trucks and water transportation. Now they are using the railroad men to force through this piece of legislation that will forge the last link around their throats and choke them to death.

I plead with the Members of the House not to let the Wheeler-Lea bill go through unless it contains the Harrington amendment. If it does not contain the Harrington amendment, let us vote it down.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. Did I not hear the gentleman state earlier in his address that, if this bill passes, the freight rates will be set by the railroads and not by the Commission?

Mr. SCHULTE. That is right.

Mr. HINSHAW. Where does the gentleman find that in the bill?

Mr. SCHULTE. Because they will be influenced by the railroads.

Mr. HINSHAW. The Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. SCHULTE. Look at the South today and ask any one of the Members from those Southern States.

Mr. HINSHAW. The Interstate Commerce Commission has been setting rates for a long time, and I believe they will probably still continue to do so. Does not the gentleman think so?

Mr. SCHULTE. I do not think there is any question about it, and, I will say, to the detriment of the people in the gentleman's district and to the detriment of the people in my district.

Mr. HINSHAW. I do not believe that.

Mr. SCHULTE. That is up to the gentleman's people. If they want higher rates, I say that is entirely up to them and to the gentleman; but the people in my district want lower rates.

Mr. HINSHAW. My people want lower rates, but I think that the best way to get lower rates, and I believe the gentleman will agree with me, is to have a healthy situation in the railroad field.

Mr. SCHULTE. I say that if the gentleman wants to cut off 225,000 jobs, that is entirely up to him.

Mr. HINSHAW. I do not want to do that. The gentleman knows that the only solution to the problem is to increase the business of the railroads, and they cannot get it unless they can lower their rates and at least break even. More business means more jobs and steadier ones to railroad employees. That is what I want, and that is what the employees and the people want.

Mr. SCHULTE. I do not want to cut off any jobs.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. It has just occurred to me, if I may reply to the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH], that the men would be influenced by local conditions, which, in my judgment, would mean that they would be influenced by whether they were working on the main lines which might be benefited by the cutting off of some of the smaller lines or whether they were on the smaller lines; and where the smaller lines were involved they would certainly be against this bill from A to Z.

Mr. SCHULTE. If the eyes of the railroad workers were opened to the real facts of this bill, they would oppose it to a man. I hope the Harrington amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday afternoon, on the floor of this House, I said that we had a ghost Governor in the State of Pennsylvania in the person of Col. Carl Estes, a citizen of the sovereign State of Texas, and, at the same time, I quoted the Scranton Times of February 21, 1939, as publishing a story headed: "Tighten your belts, James tells men looking for work. Governor tells building-trades men that he believes unemployment problem will not be solved unless there is a war." On that occasion I charged Governor James as having the ghost Governor hovering about him all during his preelection campaign, during which time Governor James repeatedly attacked W. P. A. as a wasteful and extravagant agency of the Government.

Today's Philadelphia Inquirer quotes Governor James as calling me "a liar" at his press conference yesterday afternoon. I shall read the passage:

JAMES DARES FOES TO FACE HIM ON W. P. A.—BRANDS McGRANERY AS "LIAR" FAILING TO REPRESENT DISTRICT

(By Gerson H. Lush)

HARRISBURG, February 7.—Governor James challenged congressional critics of his attacks on W. P. A. today to invite him to an "open meeting" at Washington for a full discussion of the matter.

In a fighting mood, the Governor struck back vigorously at two Pennsylvania Democrats who assailed him on the floor of the House yesterday.

He accused both Representative JAMES P. McGRANERY, of Philadelphia, and Representative J. HAROLD FLANNERY, of Pittston, of misrepresenting their constituents for not joining his battle "to try to help Pennsylvania get Pennsylvania's share."

"GHOST GOVERNOR" HIT

McGRANERY, in his Washington speech, assailed the Governor's close friend and adviser, Col. Carl L. Estes, as Pennsylvania's "ghost Governor," and said James believed a war was the only solution to the unemployment problem in this country.

At his press conference the Governor branded McGRANERY as a liar who made "so silly a statement that it hardly deserves an answer."

"McGRANERY's attack was a fool statement founded purely in political spite and animosity," the Governor declared.

"Mr. McGRANERY wants to remember as a Democrat that he still represents men and women in his district who are on relief, and he is blinded so much by partisan bitterness that he would attempt to embarrass the Governor in his efforts to do one thing to get for the people of Pennsylvania their rightful share of their own money and their right to get people on W. P. A. instead of on relief.

"If there is any ghost in this matter, it is the ghost of the forgotten men and women who ought to be on W. P. A. and not on relief."

CONFERENCE SUGGESTED

After the congressional attack on the Governor, Representative JOHN McDOWELL, Pittsburgh Republican, suggested a round-table conference, at which James would be represented. FLANNERY indorsed the idea, but insisted the Governor be there in person.

The Governor's reply was that he would be glad to attend any such conference, but in turn he insisted that Col. F. C. Harrington, National W. P. A. Administrator, be present.

QUOTA INCREASED

The Governor also pounded on FLANNERY, who hails from Luzerne County, which likewise is James' home.

"I want to get this on the record," the Governor said. "In 1935 FLANNERY was one of the most ardent Republicans in Luzerne County. He was serving in the district attorney's office and was anxious to be the Republican candidate for district attorney in Luzerne County.

"He wasn't a Roosevelt Democrat in 1932. He didn't suffer a change of heart until he was rejected as the Republican candidate for district attorney.

"Instead of finding fault with me, let him remember I am fighting to see men and women in Luzerne County who are on relief get on W. P. A."

I regret that the Governor of the great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania has seen fit to demean himself and his office by descending to the level of street jargon and using the ugly word "liar" rather than answer the charges. I reiterate the charges that I made on Tuesday afternoon in this House.

It is to be deplored that the Governor of any great Commonwealth should have so little control of his temper. Today's Philadelphia Record reported him as follows, "James, white with anger, pacing up and down his office." His vocabulary was so lacking that he was unable to deny the charges in an intelligent and gentlemanly fashion.

Perhaps it was because of the fact that the ghost Governor was not hovering about him at that time. Perhaps it was because of my exposé of the ghost Governor that he could not be there on that occasion.

The entire article is as follows:

JAMES ANGERED BY GHOST STORY—GOVERNOR FLATLY DENIES CHARGE COLONEL ESTES IS SHADOW EXECUTIVE

(By Joseph P. McLaughlin)

HARRISBURG, February 7.—Governor James today characterized as "so silly it hardly needs denial" a Democratic Congressman's charge that Col. Carl L. Estes, wealthy Texas publisher, is the "ghost Governor" of Pennsylvania.

In a fighting mood, the Governor denied flatly that Estes is behind his attacks on W. P. A., or that he, James, ever said the only real solution to the unemployment problem is war.

WHAT HE REALLY SAID

"What I really said," James declared at a press conference, "is that the New Deal's only solution to the unemployment problem is war."

The charge that Estes is the "ghost Governor" of Pennsylvania was made yesterday on the floor of Congress by Representative JAMES P. MCGRANERY, of Philadelphia.

James, his face white with anger, bitterly denounced MCGRANERY and Congressman J. HAROLD FLANNERY, of Luzerne County, who also participated in the attack. Pacing up and down his office, he said:

SPITE AND ANIMOSITY

"MCGRANERY'S attack was a fool statement, founded purely in political spite and animosity. He wants to remember as a Democrat he still represents the men and women in his district who are on relief.

"He is so blinded by partisan bitterness that he would attempt to embarrass the Governor in his efforts to do just one thing—to get for the people of Pennsylvania their rightful share of their own money and to get the people who are on relief on W. P. A.

THE ONLY GHOST

"If there is any ghost in this matter, it is the ghost of the forgotten men and women who ought to be on W. P. A. and not on relief."

At one point James, turning to me, said: "Take this down; I want to get it in the Philadelphia Record:

"In view of what the Pittsburgh Press said about Senator GUFFEY, maybe it might be a good idea to have a Texas Democrat come up here and clean out some of these Pennsylvania Democrats."

WILL JOIN CONFERENCE

James said he would gladly participate in the suggested round-table conference between Democrats, Republicans, and Work Projects Administrator F. C. Harrington to settle the controversy over responsibility for W. P. A.'s failure to fill its quota in Pennsylvania.

"Let the head of W. P. A., Colonel Harrington, be there," said James, "not a second-rate man like the administrator in Pennsylvania (Col. Philip Mathews)."

It is too late, however, for Governor James to hide the ghost Governor of Pennsylvania. He has been in the forefront since Governor James took the oath of office. His absence yesterday was conspicuous. It is evident that the Governor can make no rational public utterance without him.

Now, I am most reliably informed that Governor James will attempt to make a national figure of himself as the guest of Senator ARTHUR VANDENBERG in the city of Detroit next Monday night. At that time, on the anniversary of the birth of a truly great American, who belongs not only to one political party but to the entire American people, this violently partisan man will attempt, on a Nation-wide hook-up, to carry out the plan of his political backers, who seek to make him a candidate for President. In the Detroit speech will Governor James again be the medium for the ghost Governor? Are his backers preparing the country for a ghost President?

Can this sudden sympathy for W. P. A. on the part of Governor James have been suggested by the ghost Governor, Carl Estes? It is a known fact that Colonel Estes has made a survey of the national situation. Has he found, particularly in the large industrial localities, a high appraisement for the activities of W. P. A.? Once again, Governor James is going into a campaign, this time a national campaign, to be, as he was in the 1938 Pennsylvania campaign, "all things to all men."

My record as an advocate and strong supporter of W. P. A. speaks for itself since I have taken my seat in this House. In this and every other respect I have always represented my constituents most faithfully and conscientiously, and Governor James well knows this.

However, I have always been obstructed by a Republican administration in Philadelphia that would never subscribe in a full and fair manner to the benefits of W. P. A. A complete table of these obstructions and deficiencies was inserted as a part of my remarks last Tuesday. That table stands unchallenged. It cannot be challenged or attacked. It is the truth, and Governor James has not questioned it because he cannot. I, and my other Democratic colleagues are now obstructed by a State administration which, either through lack of intelligence or a desire to play politics with human misery, has refused to do its part toward providing sufficient funds for Pennsylvania's full participation under the W. P. A. program, which I, as well as every other liberal-thinking Member of this House, have supported. [Applause.]

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCGRANERY. I yield to my friend.

Mr. WALTER. Who is this Corporal Estes that the gentleman has described as being the ghost Governor of our State?

Mr. MCGRANERY. Corporal Estes came to Pennsylvania under a nom de plume recently and then became a part of the James campaign for Governor. He is a gentleman from the State of Texas. He served in the National Guard of that State. He was an enlisted man. The title "colonel," so far as I can ascertain, is some honorary title that was given to him, perhaps on another day by a Governor.

He may, perhaps, have been on some staff, but he is closely associated with Joseph Pew, who is the dominant figure today in the Republican Party and who has put forth Governor James as a possible candidate for President on the Republican ticket; and he has already tried to make it possible to capture the Republican National Convention for Pennsylvania and there attempt to stampede it for James. Does that answer my friend's question?

Mr. WALTER. Yes; thank you.

Mr. SACKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCGRANERY. I yield.

Mr. SACKS. Is it not true that the Governor of Pennsylvania is trying to find an excuse for the promises he made to balance the budget and to continue W. P. A., which he has not kept since he has been in office?

Mr. MCGRANERY. I have already repeated that the Governor of Pennsylvania stamped up and down the State of Pennsylvania, leveling charges against W. P. A. and calling it an extravagant agency on the part of the Government and a wasteful one. However, he has done an about-face with the two gentlemen [Mr. CORBETT and Mr. MCDOWELL]. My colleagues from Pennsylvania well know the views of most of the Republican Members from Pennsylvania and they are not, and never have been, in sympathy with the W. P. A. program.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGRANERY. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. My friend, then, thinks that instead of being a reckless ranger from Texas, in addition to being a ghost Governor, this gentleman is also most likely one of those phantom colonels we hear about.

Mr. McGRANERY. I believe there would be a great deal of truth in what the gentleman has said.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGRANERY. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania tell us whether or not this "ghost" of whom he speaks, now resides in the executive mansion at Harrisburg, at the expense of the taxpayers of Pennsylvania?

Mr. McGRANERY. I have been most reliably informed that that is true, and notwithstanding Colonel Estes took up residence very close to the executive mansion, he now resides in the executive mansion itself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

SENATE

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1940

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 7, 1940)

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art most pure, most wise, most holy, before whom angels veil their faces and saints confess their sinfulness: How shall we come before Thy presence save with a sense of our complete unworthiness? How trifling seem the things for which we strive; yea, the very thought of Thee makes all else seem poor. And though we be tied and bound with the chain of our sins, yet let the pitifulness of Thy great mercy loose us, that, with pure hearts and minds, we may serve Thee in the spirit and power of the blessed Christ, who was in all points tempted like as are we, yet without sin.

Speak to each one of us through the voice of stillness, reminding us of our high vocation, and at evening, when the day is done, lead us beyond the glory of the sunset to the gates of Thy high place, and let Thy peace come down upon us with the twilight and the stars as the benediction of a Father's love, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

LOANS TO FINLAND

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate met today following a recess, and the pending business is what is known as the Finnish loan bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3069) to provide for certain loans to the Republic of Finland by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Michigan, in charge of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BROWN. I wish to make a very brief statement, and then I will yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish, with the Senator's consent, to have the Senate take up a matter which will lead to no controversy.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to make a statement about the parliamentary situation, and then I shall be glad to yield.

The bill as originally introduced was amended in the Banking and Currency Committee, and was again amended in the Foreign Relations Committee. I ask unanimous consent that the bill as reported from the Foreign Relations Committee be considered as the matter pending before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the bill as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations shall be considered as an original bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I have no objection if that will carry the amendment to the title of the bill which was first reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency. It will be observed that the title of the bill now reads "To provide for certain loans to the Republic of Finland by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation," whereas the real title of the bill should be "To provide for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and for other purposes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Cannot that be corrected if unanimous consent is given?

Mr. MCNARY. I should like that stipulation incorporated in the unanimous-consent agreement, so that we shall have the completed product of the Foreign Relations Committee on the floor of the Senate for its consideration when it comes up.

Mr. BROWN. That is agreeable to me. We amended the title in the Banking and Currency Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amended suggestion of the Senator from Michigan? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

INVESTIGATION OF CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before making a request for unanimous consent I will state to the Senate that there is on the calendar a resolution in regular form, similar to resolutions which have previously been adopted in all election years, providing for the appointment of a special committee of five Senators to act, of course, only during the primary and general elections in the year 1940. The resolution is Senate Resolution 212. It has had the approval of the Privileges and Elections Committee and has gone to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and been favorably reported from that committee. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be taken up and acted upon at this time, so that it may be out of the way, and the committee may be appointed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which will be read by the clerk.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 212, submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] on January 10, 1940, which had been reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with amendments, and from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate without additional amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections will be stated.

The amendments were, on page 3, line 9, after the word "chairman", to insert "or any member"; and on line 10, to strike out "any member", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That a special committee consisting of five Senators, to be appointed by the Vice President, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the campaign expenditures of the various Presidential candidates, Vice Presidential candidates, and candidates for the United States Senate, in all parties, the names of the persons, firms, or corporations subscribing the amount contributed, the method of expenditure of said sums, and all facts in relation thereto, not only as to the subscriptions of money and expenditures thereof, but as to the use of any other means or influence, including the promise or use of patronage or use of any public funds, and all other facts in relation thereto which would not only be of public interest but which would aid the Senate in enacting any remedial legislation or in deciding any contests which might be instituted involving the right to a seat in the United States Senate.

No Senator shall be appointed upon said committee from a State in which a Senator is to be elected at the general election in 1940.

The investigation hereby provided for, in all the respects above enumerated, shall apply to candidates and to contests before primaries, conventions, and the contests and campaign terminating in the general election in 1940.

Said committee is hereby authorized to act upon its own initiative and upon such information as in its judgment may be reasonable or reliable. Upon complaint being made before said committee, under oath, by any person, persons, candidate, or political committee, setting forth allegations as to facts which under this resolution it would be the duty of said committee to investigate, the said committee shall investigate such charges as fully as though it were acting upon its own motion, unless, after a hearing upon such complaint, the committee shall find that the allegations in said complaint are immaterial or untrue.

Said committee is hereby authorized, in the performance of its duties, to sit at such times and places, either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, as it deems necessary or proper. It is specifically authorized to require the attendance of witnesses by subpena or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, clerical, and other assistants; and to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words.

Said committee is hereby specifically authorized to act through any subcommittee authorized to be appointed by said committee. The chairman or any member of said committee or of any subcommittee may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpenas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee or who appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation, shall be punished as prescribed by law.

The expenses of said investigation, not exceeding in the aggregate $30,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers signed by the chairman of the committee or the chairman of any subcommittee.

All hearings before said committee shall be public, and all orders or decisions of the committee shall be public.

The committee shall make a full report to the Senate on the first day of the next session of the Congress.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH SOVIET RUSSIA

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The American Coalition is the central spokesmanship of a group of about 40 well-known standard patriotic organizations in the United States. It held its annual meeting in Washington on January 31, 1940, and adopted certain resolutions regarding Russian-American relationships. I ask that the resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolution adopted by the American Coalition at its annual meeting in Washington, D. C., January 31, 1940

5. DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH SOVIET RUSSIA

Whereas diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union were established on the undertakings set forth in an exchange of notes dated November 16, 1933, between the President of the United States and the People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as follows:

[Excerpt from letter of President Franklin D. Roosevelt to Mr. Maxim M. Litvinov, People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, November 16, 1933]

"1. To respect scrupulously the indisputable right of the United States to order its own life within its own jurisdiction in its own way and to refrain from interfering in any manner in the internal affairs of the United States, its territories or possessions.

"2. To refrain and to restrain all persons in government service and all organizations of the government or under its direct or indirect control, including organizations in receipt of any financial assistance from it, from any act overt or covert liable in any way whatsoever to injure the tranquillity, prosperity, order, or security of the whole or any part of the United States, its territories or possessions, and in particular from any act tending to incite or encourage armed intervention or any agitation or propaganda having as an aim the violation of the territorial integrity of the United States, its territories or possessions, or the bringing about by force of a change in the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States, its territories or possessions.

"3. Not to permit the formation or residence on its territory of any organization or group—and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization or group, or of representatives or officials of any organization or group—which makes claim to be the Government of, or makes attempt upon the territorial integrity of, the United States, its territories or possessions; not to form, subsidize, support, or permit on its territory military organizations or groups having the aim of armed struggle against the United States, its territories or possessions, and to prevent any recruiting on behalf of such organizations and groups.

"4. Not to permit the formation or residence on its territory of any organization or group—and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization or group, or of representatives or officials of any organization or group—which has as an aim the overthrow or the preparation for the overthrow of, or the bringing about by force of a change in, the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States, its territories or possessions." And

Whereas the recognition of Soviet Russia has resulted in no benefit to our country and much embarrassment through its attempts to subvert our republican form of government and exchange the benefits derived from the Christian religion to the immoral possibilities of their atheistic attitude; and

Whereas evidence of a conclusive nature obtained during investigations by the Dies committee has been deemed by this committee to "constitute a violation of the treaty of recognition entered into between the Government of the United States and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in 1933" (p. 4, H. Rept. No. 1476, 76th Cong., 3d sess.): Be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States and the Congress be advised that the American Coalition urges that the diplomatic and consular representatives of the United States to the Soviet Union be withdrawn and the appropriations for their maintenance be discontinued.

LOANS TO FINLAND

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3069) to provide for certain loans to the Republic of Finland by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. I recently had a letter from one of the most interesting ladies it has ever been my privilege to know, Mrs. Nina Gore Auchincloss, who is the daughter of a former distinguished Member of this body, former Senator Gore, of Oklahoma. Because the letter deals with a wholly American point of view, and because it sets so justifiable a note for our consideration at this time, I feel it of sufficient public import that I ask unanimous consent to have it extended in the RECORD as part of my remarks. I send the letter to the desk, asking unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD as part of my observations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

FEBRUARY 9, 1940.

Senator JOHN A. DANAHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR DANAHER: I am not unmindful of what you are trying to do and I wish to submit to you a few observations which seem to me apropos the present situation.

There can be no possible denial that charity is the prime virtue. Like mercy, "it is twice bless'd; it blesseth him that gives, and him that takes." It is the duty of those who can to bestow charity. It is also their duty to use discretion and judgment on whom they bestow it. Since only a Midas could have enough for all that are in need, it is becoming a little frightening to observe the rampant hysteria in our country today.

I would be the last to begrudge any help we may offer to the American friends of Czechoslovakia, urgent relief for France, American friends of France, bundles for Britain, Polish, and Finnish sundry reliefs (and we might as well throw in the Turkish earthquake), if I felt we had looked after and taken care of all our own people in want. Has this been done? The answer is not yes. Until it is there might be a bit of stinting on our good deeds across the sea.

We do not have to go over the mountain into the shadow of the valley to find cold, hungry, ill children, women, and men. It is painting no imaginary picture to depict thousands of American children sleeping sans blankets on pallets, hoping the animal heat of their brothers and sisters will keep them above zero. When those children get up in the mornings there may not be a warm sweater to put on (but daily there is frantic knitting all over the country, destination Europe). These children's shoes have newspaper folded in the bottoms as some protection against the hole in the sole; an inadequacy of food is their daily diet. The fate of our country is in the hands of these children we neglect today. Forgetting these obligations is unfair to the well-cared-for children, making more of an elephant load for them to carry through any future disaster that may befall our country. I do not have to wonder what my reactions would be. My children were in want, when I saw and heard the people who could help me and mine ballyhooing the destitution of those from three to six thousand miles way. The usual complaint is that mankind can't see beyond the end of its nose—now farsightedness seems to be on the rapid increase.

Most assuredly our sympathies cannot help but run high when we hear of the suffering in Europe. But we Americans should be more realistic. Sympathetic emotionalism prepares fertile ground for war propaganda. Probably one of the reasons our forefathers came over here was because they judged their future by their past—thousands of years of warring.

Helping there may be more glamorous, but it is not discharging our proper duty, which is right here in Washington and amid the vast numbers of unfortunates throughout our country. It is vitally important that during these cold weeks there have not been enough shelters for the homeless men, as the pictures in the Washington Star of January 4 and 5 bring to our attention with the force of a sledge hammer. But I have heard of no movement to rectify this. There are quite a few cases in our hospitals of men with frozen feet. The shelter of a doorway is insufficient protection during a blizzardy night.

There is a saying, long since passed into a proverb, that the Americans love to be humbugged. A little pressure on the brakes might be in order against the guinea pig rapidity with which all these relief agencies are springing up. Otherwise they may become our national vice, our besetting sin.

The New Testament says, "But if any provide not for his own, and specially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel."

Faithfully yours,

NINA GORE AUCHINCLOSS.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I do not intend to occupy very much of the time of the Senate in the consideration of this bill, because it is one that has had thorough public discussion in the newspapers and over the radio, and has already been the subject of considerable debate here in the Senate.

I feel that I ought to give a general but short summary of the activities of the Export-Import Bank. I do this principally because the main discussion about this bill has concerned a loan on the part of the Export-Import Bank to Finland, whereas the bill as finally reported by the two committees of the Senate, of course, covers many other matters.

The Export-Import Bank is a District of Columbia governmental corporation. Its authority comes from an Executive Order of the President, which was issued under authority granted by law in the National Recovery Act.

Its life has twice been extended, first to July of 1939, and again to July of 1941; so that at present the bank is entitled to do business until July 1, 1941. At that time its right to make further loans will expire, unless renewed.

The present limitation upon the power of the bank to loan money is $100,000,000. Its funds are obtained either by subscriptions to capital or by advances from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That sum has been used, I think, about two and a half times over. I shall shortly give the present condition of the institution.

With respect to the matter now before the Senate—the increase of the capital of the bank—I may say that last July the Banking and Currency Committee recommended to the Senate that it increase the capital of the bank to $200,000,000. When I say "capital," I mean the loaning power. The Senate, by the passage of a bill early in August, fixed the amount at $175,000,000. Because of the adjournment of Congress soon thereafter, and I think for no other reason, the bill did not reach the floor of the House, being under consideration by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House when Congress adjourned. So the present condition is that the bank has a loaning power of $100,000,000. The bill now before the Senate increases that amount to $200,000,000. I think it is fair to say that the purpose of the Banking and Currency Committee in making the amount $200,000,000 instead of $175,000,000, as previously passed by the Senate, was to provide for and cover the loan which we hope will be made to the Finns.

The general purpose of the bank is to encourage the sale of American agricultural and manufactured products to foreign countries. The usual transaction is about as follows: The General Motors Corporation will propose to sell, we will say, $5,000,000 worth of goods either to a South American republic or to citizens of South America. It is the kind of a transaction which the corporation itself, perhaps because of dangers that it apprehends, is not itself willing to finance entirely. The Export-Import Bank comes in and supplies a part of the capital, and assumes a part of the risk. If Senators will glance through the report of the Export-Import Bank as it was presented to the two committees, they will find that usually the Federal Loan Administrator or the trustees of the bank require that the selling corporation—using my illustration of the General Motors Corporation in Detroit—assume, say, 25 percent or 50 percent of the risk involved, and the bank assumes the remainder.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I should like to have that made clear. It is my understanding that the Export-Import Bank will carry 65 to 75 percent of any loss which may be incurred as a result of credits which accrue from the sale by the American corporation to the foreign corporation or foreign government.

Mr. BROWN. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that it may assume a hundred percent of the loss.

Mr. ADAMS. It does, in some cases.

Mr. BROWN. It may assume 50 percent or 25 percent. What the general average is I do not know; but I well recall instances in which their share was as low as 25 percent, and it runs up, as the Senator has said, to 65 or 75 percent.

Mr. ADAMS. I should like to have the Senator explain why, in his judgment, the United States Government should furnish not only the credit with which the business is done, but should carry 65, 75, or 100 percent of any loss incurred. In the answer to that inquiry I am sure the Senate would be interested.

Mr. BROWN. In the sale abroad of our agricultural products, such as cotton, in the sale of our manufactured products, such as Frigidaires, or automobile trucks, the American citizens who engage in those lines of trade are unwilling to take all the risk, and if we are to encourage the sale of our surplus agricultural products and our surplus manufactured products, it is necessary, in the opinion, I think, of the Congress, as shown when we passed the law, and in the minds of those who administer it, that the Government should assume some of the risk. It is in a sense a relief measure for American agriculture and for American manufacture by encouraging sales.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I hasten to say, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, that the record of the bank has been excellent. For example, for the last year, 1939, its profit was $1,744,000. Its operations have been highly successful and the administration by Mr. Jones and his associates is to be highly commended.

I yield now to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I am sure that it is not to be logically and properly inferred, from the statement made by the Senator a moment ago, that all our agricultural and manufactured exports call for the interposition of the bank.

Mr. BROWN. Certainly not.

Mr. KING. Because we are exporting billions of dollars' worth of commodities, and in only a very small percentage of those commodities, in value, is the risk assumed by the Federal Government.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator is entirely correct about that, and I think what he points out is well shown by the record of the bank in the matter of profit.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. In addition to what the Senator has said about the successful operation of the bank, is it not also true as demonstrating the care which has been exercised in extending its credit that there has not been a single default in the repayment of any of the loans thus far?

Mr. BROWN. I take what the Senator says to be true. I do not myself happen to know that to be a fact.

Showing, briefly, the present status, and the necessity for increasing the loanable power of the bank, I call attention to the fact that the total loans outstanding on January 31, 1940, just a few days ago, amounted to $68,000,000, and the undisbursed commitments to $62,000,000, or approximately $30,000,000 beyond the power of the bank to lend. Of course, someone may immediately ask why the trustees of this bank should commit the bank to lend more money than it has. The answer is that the commitments are not always taken; in other words, people who make arrangements to borrow do not finally borrow. But it is a fact, as I think is amply demonstrated by the statement, that the institution could very well use the additional $100,000,000, and certainly must have it if it is going to make any further advances to Finland, to Norway, and to others.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. In that connection, with reference to the matter of commitments, we should, should we not, have the record straight? There are loans amounting to approximately $20,000,000 with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Farm Credit Administration on the paper, so that that money is and would be available to the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. BROWN. There is no obligation, I am informed by the Secretary of the Export-Import Bank, on the part of either of the governmental institutions to which the Senator refers. Those loans were taken over by the Export-Import Bank without recourse to those governmental institutions.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, does not the Senator recall the testimony of Mr. Jones on the point, to the effect that that sum could be taken up again and thus be made available for commitments?

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator says so it must be so, but I myself do not know it. I do not recall that testimony.

Mr. President, I have had prepared a 3½-page summary of the activities of the Export-Import Bank, which I shall not burden the Senate to read, because I think I have generally covered the subject matter; but I ask to have it printed at this point in my remarks for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK OF WASHINGTON

The Export-Import Bank of Washington was formed in order to make it possible for American manufacturers and exporters to compete upon more nearly equal terms with foreign competitors in other industrial nations who were able to obtain financial assistance from their respective governments. It has operated principally in four major fields:

First, the bank has extended short-term credits in connection with the exportation of agricultural products, especially cotton and tobacco, where such facilities were not readily available through private financial institutions. The bank has assisted in the sale of American raw cotton to foreign spinners and dealers by establishing through the facilities of our commercial banks lines of credit available to American cotton shippers. These credits have been guaranteed by the leading banks in the countries of the purchasers. The principal countries to which American shippers have exported cotton under such lines of credit are Italy, Poland, and Spain. More than 400,000 bales have been exported through the facilities of the bank to date, and the operations have been entirely satisfactory.

Second, the bank has extended credits directly to American firms desiring to export industrial products, particularly heavy machinery and electrical and railway equipment. The durable-goods industries in the United States have experienced a high percentage of unemployment, and while there is a large demand abroad for their products competition from foreign sources has been very keen. The practice of the bank has been to offer credit terms approaching those available to foreign manufacturers through their governments, the average having been about 4 years. These transactions have usually been accomplished by discounting the obligations of the foreign purchaser after they have been endorsed or otherwise unconditionally guaranteed by a sound foreign bank.

This type of business is most beneficial to American concerns because the installation of basic equipment is almost invariably followed by "repeat" orders for replacements and extensions. The conclusion of the European war will see greatly increased competition for desirable markets and every effort should now be made to assure continued outlets for our capital goods.

Such credits have been made available to American manufacturers doing business in many countries, including Argentina, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Cuba, Colombia, Finland, Haiti, Iran, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Portugal, and Venezuela.

The general practice of the bank is to require the interested American exporter to participate with the bank in the extension of the credit, thus assuring the greatest possible use of the bank's funds.

An example of a typical piece of business is the credit extended in December 1938 to the Universal Trading Corporation in order to facilitate exports to China. Of a total authorization of $25,000,000 the sum of $17,090,000 has been actually utilized; and of this amount $2,239,000 has already been repaid. Under the commitment there have been 570 individual purchases, representing dealings with 363 different firms located in 27 States.

The wide diffusion of benefits resulting from the sale of heavy equipment can be illustrated by pointing out that the construction of a single locomotive requires approximately 86,527 man-hours of work distributed among 85 different localities throughout the United States.

Third, to meet the needs of small American exporters, the bank has extended credit lines up to $20,000 each to individual firms who are experienced and of good business reputation but who are hampered by lack of capital in obtaining accommodations from private sources. Here again it has been the custom of the bank to designate a commercial institution to handle such accounts. The credits are revolving and are available to the interested American exporter upon presenting short-term drafts on approved foreign purchasers.

Under this arrangement some concerns have been able to turn over their line of credit from five to six times during the course of a year.

Fourth, for the sole purpose of providing dollar exchange required to meet promptly the obligations due American exporters, the bank has agreed to extend credits to leading banks of several countries. The purposes of such transactions are to alleviate temporary adverse exchange situations and to maintain trade with the United States upon a free exchange basis. The operation of these transactions has been uniformly satisfactory.

Although the Export-Import Bank was created in February 1934 it did not function actively until nearly 2 years later. Since that time through January 31, 1940, the Export-Import Bank has made total commitments in excess of $290,700,000 covering trade with 55 foreign countries. Either because the interested American shippers were unable to secure the business or succeeded in obtaining the necessary financing elsewhere, commitments in excess of $109,000,000 were canceled.

Actual disbursements for this period have amounted to $119,905,653, of which $51,750,619 has been repaid.

Total loans outstanding on January 31, 1940, were $68,155,034, and undisbursed commitments $62,994,854.

Net earnings of the bank have ranged from $19,221 in the calendar year 1935, to $2,344,776 in the calendar year 1939. Since its establishment through January 31, 1940, the net earnings of the bank aggregated $5,074,754.

While these are sizable figures they do not represent a large percentage of the Nation's total foreign trade. At the same time the assistance provided by the bank has been of vital importance to certain of our industries and to many of our localities. The record of the bank is good. It has cost the taxpayer nothing, and it should be permitted through the enactment of the bill now under consideration to continue to serve American agriculture and industry.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I pass now to a subject which I know is of greater interest and concern to us, namely, why the Finnish loan bill which I introduced was attached to the Export-Import Bank bill.

I introduced a bill—which I frankly favor today, but which I am not willing to press now because I do not think the bill can pass—providing for a loan to Finland of $60,000,000, unrestricted as to what Finland could buy, and as to where the money should be spent, because under present circumstances I felt that it was desirable, in the interest of this country, to assist the Finnish people. After discussing the matter with various administrative agencies, I came to the conclusion that the best measure we could get was the bill which is now before the Senate. Possibly we may be able to amend it, to improve it a little further along the line of my own thought, but I am not sure that can be done. That will be for later consideration of the Senate. But it was felt that if we could follow the practice which has already been adopted by the Export-Import Bank, of lending the funds of the bank in the amount of $10,000,000, which was the amount Mr. Jones and his associates had authorized before this matter came up, it would be well to use that agency to lend money to the Finnish Government, or to corporations whose obligations were guaranteed and assured by the Finnish Government for the purpose of buying our goods.

The President sent a message to the Congress on the subject, and after that message was received I discussed it briefly with the administration, and discussed it quite fully with the Federal Loan Administrator and with the General Counsel for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and together we drafted the bill substantially as it is now presented to the Senate.

The bill provides that the capital of the Export-Import Bank shall be increased to $200,000,000, an increase of $100,000,000 over the present authorization. It provides that no one country—and its nationals—may have more than $20,000,000 of this amount in addition to what has now been committed to that country.

Reduced to a practical situation, it means that the Federal Loan Administrator may advance $20,000,000 more to Finland, he having already committed $10,000,000 to them, so that the ultimate power of his ability to lend to the Finns would be $30,000,000, either under the Banking and Currency Committee bill or the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, which is the bill now before us.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. It is my understanding that the bill provides additional authority for the lending of $20,000,000.

Mr. BROWN. That is correct.

Mr. REYNOLDS. In the case of China, we loaned them $25,000,000, and I understand from the Federal Loan Administrator that at the present time they have utilized $2,295,000 of the $25,000,000.

Mr. BROWN. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Would this mean that the Federal Loan Administrator or one of his agencies would be permitted to lend an additional $20,000,000 to China?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; if the facts are correct.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Which would make a total of $45,000,000; or, subtracting what they already have, it would make a total of about $40,000,000?

Mr. BROWN. Between $40,000,000 and $45,000,000 would be the ultimate amount which could go to China; because, as the Senator points out, of the $25,000,000 loan, a part has been paid; but to no other country, including Finland, could the amount exceed $30,000,000 hereafter.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, the tabulation that was given us by the Committee on Banking and Currency—perhaps changed since that time—indicates that the amount outstanding of the China loan is $14,000,000; that the actual amount which has been disbursed is $16,090,000, of which $2,039,000 has been repaid. My inquiry is whether or not the bill would allow the increase in addition to the amount outstanding, or in addition to the amount originally authorized?

Mr. BROWN. The bill plainly uses the word "authorized." Therefore I think to the present commitment to China, whatever it may be, there could be added $20,000,000, which would be the total that could now be loaned to China.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It occurs to me that the use of the unlimited phrase "loans to China" carries a much broader implication than the practice of the Export-Import Bank contemplates.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think it would be well to have that definitely in mind, for it presents a rather different picture when we remember that the previous loan to China so far is simply the use of American money to finance a barter trade of American commodities for tung oil, and that the new loan contemplated—the so-called new loan—is actually not a loan at all but is merely the financing of an exchange of tin for American commodities. That is rather a different picture from that presented by the broad phrase of a "loan to China."

Mr. BROWN. I have been referring more particularly to outside limitations. The Senator is entirely correct. I think he makes an exceedingly valuable contribution when he points out that these are not outright loans to particular governments; they are advances to citizens of the United States to aid them in the sale of their surplus agricultural or manufactured goods to a government or to the nationals of a government, and they are in no sense of the word loans to China or to Finland.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will my colleague further yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I may supplement what has been previously said with the further information from the record that in the tung-oil barter transaction the American purchases came from 570 different American firms. So that the use of the loose phrase "loans to China" in no sense describes the actual nature of the transaction which has occurred or is subsequently contemplated, and I think it makes considerable difference.

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I invite the Senator's attention to the amendment on page 2 of the measure reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations——

Mr. BROWN. In large type, beginning in line 17?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes. What is the interpretation of the Senator of that specific language, if today there is an outstanding commitment to China of $16,000,000? The provision reads:

Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans outstanding at any one time that may be hereafter authorized to any one country shall not exceed $20,000,000.

Is it agreed that there is outstanding today a loan of $16,000,000 to China?

Mr. BROWN. Fourteen million fifty-one thousand dollars is the figure that is shown to me.

Mr. BYRNES. Then if the amount of the loan to China outstanding at this time is $14,000,000, I read on:

That may be hereafter authorized to any one country shall not exceed $20,000,000.

Does that mean that we can add no more than $6,000,000 to that outstanding loan of $14,000,000, or does it mean the reverse, and that we can add an additional commitment of $20,000,000?

Mr. BROWN. I think the intent of the Foreign Relations Committee, and certainly the intent of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I believe the plain implication of the language, is that $20,000,000 more than is now outstanding by way of commitments on the part of the Export-Import Bank may be loaned to China or its nationals.

Mr. BYRNES. I know that that was the purpose of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I wondered if there was any change of purpose by the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. BROWN. I understand not.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. I am glad to yield to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. PITTMAN. The amendment was placed in there largely by reason of the desire of the United States Government to acquire tin from China. It was testified before the committee that the form of the limitation as it came from the Committee on Banking and Currency would prevent any further loan to China except to the extent of $8,000,000, and that the United States was very desirous of obtaining tin from China. As it is now, we get tung oil from China under the previous loan.

Mr. BYRNES. If the bill provided that hereafter there shall be no loan authorized exceeding $20,000,000, I would have no doubt about it. When it says, "the aggregate amount of loans outstanding at any one time that may be hereafter authorized", it is a little confusing. I wanted to know what the members of the committee thought about that.

Mr. BROWN. I think the phrase "that may be hereafter authorized to any one country" would clearly permit the authorities of the bank to lend $20,000,000 in addition to that which has been authorized heretofore, and I think that that was the intent of the Foreign Relations Committee. It was not its intent to change the original $30,000,000 limitation to any one country, except in the case of China, because of the special circumstances which the Senator has pointed out.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I cannot agree to that at all. The limitation as it came from the Committee on Banking and Currency was a limitation of an aggregate of $30,000,000 to any one borrower. The committee placed the limitation upon the aggregate borrowing for exports to any one country. So there is no change in the intent; but the limitation now, instead of applying to past loans, applies only to loans hereafter authorized, and such loans will be limited to an aggregate of $20,000,000.

The $20,000,000 was arrived at because it was not designed to change the limitation with regard to Finland. The limitation as affecting Finland in the Committee on Banking and Currency bill was an aggregate of $30,000,000. An authorization for $10,000,000 has already been made for Finland. Therefore if we made the limitation to authorize an additional loan of $20,000,000 it would place Finland in exactly the same position as it would be in under the bill of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BROWN. I think perhaps my language was a little too broad. I have exactly the same intention that has been so clearly expressed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. Briefly, to illustrate, there is now $2,000,000 outstanding in commitments to Haiti. I should say that the total amount which under the bill could be loaned to Haiti—or to her citizens to assist in Haitian trade—would be a total of $22,000,000.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think that is a correct interpretation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURKE in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. BARKLEY. Senators will recall that in the Committee on Banking and Currency discussion took place as to whether any limitation that might be fixed should apply to loans hereafter made or should be a general maximum applying to all loans outstanding and that might be authorized hereafter.

Mr. BROWN. I well remember that discussion.

Mr. BARKLEY. And the committee fixed $30,000,000 as the maximum that could be outstanding at any one time, including past loans and future loans. The language was a little unfortunate because it did not carry the real meaning of the committee that the $30,000,000 limitation should apply to loans made for the exportation of American products to any one country, rather than to a loan made directly to a country, for none of these loans have been made directly to a government as such.

In the Committee on Foreign Relations it was made perfectly plain that what we were trying to do and what we had intended to do in the Committee on Banking and Currency was to limit the amount of loan that could be made to anybody for the exportation of goods to any one country. The $30,000,000 limitation, as the provision was originally made in the Committee on Banking and Currency, would make possible a $20,000,000 additional loan to Finland or for exports to Finland.

Mr. BROWN. Or $30,000,000 in all.

Mr. BARKLEY. Thirty million dollars in all. Twenty-five million dollars to China has already been authorized. The Export-Import Bank authorized a loan of $25,000,000 to the Universal Trading Corporation for the exportation of American products to China. That loan has not all been taken, and a little over $2,000,000 of that which was taken has been repaid. There would be still some $6,000,000 or more available to China out of the original authorization of $25,000,000; so that when this language provides that the total that may be hereafter authorized shall not exceed $20,000,000, it seems to me it does not apply at all to the $25,000,000 loan to China which has already been authorized.

Mr. BROWN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the report of the Export-Import Bank there is a notation that the commitment now available to the exporter in the case of China is $8,910,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. So that amount would be available beyond the $20,000,000 provided in the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct. Without the bill the Export-Import Bank could still finance the exportation of $8,000,000 more of goods to China under the $25,000,000 loan already authorized.

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. In addition to that it could provide for the extra $20,000,000.

Mr. BROWN. In addition to the sum which is now outstanding and taken.

Mr. BARKLEY. So there could be a total outstanding for the benefit of China of $45,000,000, including the $25,000,000 already authorized and the new $20,000,000 which might be authorized.

Mr. BROWN. I think there should be deducted from the Senator's estimate the amount which China has paid.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is possibly true. There is a question whether or not the Export-Import Bank could reloan to China what has been repaid on the loan already made.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. If the words in line 18, "outstanding at any one time," were eliminated, the language would read:

Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans that may be hereafter authorized to any one country shall not exceed $20,000,000.

Why would not that accomplish what the Senator declares is the purpose?

Mr. BROWN. Let me say to the Senator that his suggestion sounds very good to me, but I would not feel justified in accepting it on the floor without further consideration.

Mr. BYRNES. I would not want to offer it.

Mr. BROWN. The legislative counsel is present, and when I shall have concluded this speech—I wish to say a few words about Finland; I have not yet said much about Finland—I should like to discuss it with him and with the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, as well as the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee. Possibly we can clear up any ambiguity, if there is ambiguity in that language.

Mr. BYRNES. That is all I wished to suggest. I would not offer an amendment, because I think it can be done better if someone will sit down and carefully think out the language. I would rather have the committee do it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. That language was suggested by Mr. Jones in writing. I do not think the committee would have any objection to making the language definite and certain so far as the intent is concerned, but I think there is plenty of time to discuss the matter.

Mr. BYRNES. I think so. Whenever the purpose is agreed upon, we should have no difficulty about the language.

Mr. PITTMAN. The purpose is perfectly clear.

Mr. BYRNES. Those words really confuse it, if I correctly understand the purpose.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know that the Senator's suggestion would accomplish the purpose. As I listened to it I did not think it would. However, there is no use taking up time with that now.

Mr. BYRNES. My only question was whether or not the words "outstanding at any one time" might be eliminated without defeating the purpose.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I think it ought to be kept in mind that this is a revolving fund. If we limit the language so that only $20,000,000 may be hereafter authorized, if that $20,000,000 should be repaid this language would prevent the lending of any more money to the same country or for the benefit of the same country.

Mr. BROWN. That is not our intention.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is not the object of the measure.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the Senator from New York, the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. WAGNER. Let me call the attention of the Senator to another limitation which I think this amendment places upon the amendment adopted by the Banking and Currency Committee. At least it removes an ambiguity. The amendment adopted by the Banking and Currency Committee provided that the aggregate amount of loans to any one borrower, outstanding and authorized at any one time, should not exceed $30,000,000. The question was raised whether or not that amount included loans to nationals within a country, in addition to the country itself.

Mr. BROWN. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. Take the case of China. The loan of an additional $30,000,000 may be authorized, reduced by the outstanding loan; but the nationals of China may, as the nationals of other countries do, receive further credits from the Export-Import Bank, thus violating the spirit of the law under a strict interpretation, and providing for a loan to the nationals of a country much greater than the amount of our limitation. So the amendment as it now reads—

The aggregate amount of loans outstanding at any one time that may be hereafter authorized to any one country—includes not only the country itself, but also the nationals within that country.

Mr. BROWN. I think the Senator has stated the matter very clearly.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the bill as introduced by the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] provided directly for a loan to Finland of not to exceed $60,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. BROWN. That is correct.

Mr. ASHURST. The bill as returned to the Senate by the committees would seem to indicate that authority might be granted to make loans to other governments. Is that true?

Mr. BROWN. That is true.

Mr. ASHURST. What other government than the Government of Finland is it contemplated shall receive loans?

Mr. BROWN. Loans have been authorized to the Norwegian Government. I am quite sure that a loan to the Swedish Government has been discussed. One has been discussed for the Danes. Several South American countries have obtained assistance in the purchase of American agricultural and manufactured supplies.

Mr. ASHURST. Although I am not a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I have confidence in the members of that committee, as well as in the members of the Banking and Currency Committee. However, it seems to me that in these difficult times it would have been better had the bill named the country to which loans are to be made. I regret that the committees did not see fit to let the country to which we are to make a loan be named in the bill. The United States is brave enough to make a loan or to withhold a loan. If we make a loan to any foreign powers, it should be made directly, and not screened in any way. We should say to the world, "We will make loans," or "We will not make loans." We should not be put into an equivocal position. Within a few months it may develop that we have loaned money to some government that Congress did not anticipate should receive a loan. I am but performing an act of supererogation in saying to the Senate, "Never sign blank checks." Make the loan if you wish. Withhold it if you wish. But, Senators, it is of doubtful propriety; it is dubious statesmanship and may lead into trouble, to give to anyone in this Government the right to make a loan. Congress should name the country to which the loan is to be made.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator realizes, of course, that, as my colleague the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] well pointed out a few moments ago, we are not making direct loans to foreign governments.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not want to enter into a controversy now, but I think Mr. Jones' testimony is contrary to what the Senator has just stated. Loans have been made directly to foreign governments.

Mr. BROWN. Let me finish and I think the Senator will not be in disagreement with me. Money was advanced—call it a loan—to purchasers of American agricultural and manufactured articles—to assist various nations in purchasing our surplus agricultural and manufactured products. That is the justification for the entire bill.

As a general thing, the advances have been made to the nationals of other nations, and we are not entering into the policy of making money loans to other nations with no restrictions upon the use of the money. It is not as though the Senator from Arizona came into a bank operated by the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] in Winchester, Va.—I am not accusing the Senator from Virginia of being a banker, but I am merely using that as an illustration—and asked him for a loan of $10,000.

If the Senator from Arizona obtained such a loan, he could do what he wished with the $10,000. That is not the kind of loan we are talking about. We are talking about a loan which will assist American agriculture and business in the sale of surplus commodities, and which is restricted as to its use and purpose as follows:

First. The loan must not be in violation of international law.

Second. It must not be for arms and munitions as heretofore defined by the President.

Mr. ASHURST. Congress may have once fallen into deliquescence; but in the past year Congress has restored itself in the esteem of the American people. The world knows that this is a loan to Finland. If it were not for Finland's needs and requirements, this bill would not be before us.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. ASHURST. If so, I want to know it.

Mr. BROWN. I do not know whether or not the Senator voted for the increase in the lending power of the Export-Import Bank last August.

Mr. ASHURST. I did not.

Mr. BROWN. To the best of my recollection no record vote was taken. However, we did increase the lending power of the Export-Import Bank, which has been making such loans since 1935, by increasing its loanable funds in the amount of $75,000,000.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to permit me to make one more statement.

Mr. BROWN. I gladly yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I intend to be a candidate for reelection to the Senate. Beyond any doubt I shall be asked whether or not I voted for the loan to Finland. I want to be able to say that I did or did not. When I vote for this bill do I, by any intendment, vote for an opportunity for Finland to receive a loan? I favor the loan to Finland.

Mr. BROWN. I think I can answer that question without qualification by saying that the Federal Loan Administrator, Mr. Jones, in his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee, plainly stated that he thought that the Finns were entitled to a credit of at least $10,000,000 more than they now have; and I have not the slightest doubt that he and the President of the United States are in accord in that respect, because the President sent a message to Congress in effect urging that we do this in order that Finland might obtain a loan.

Mr. ASHURST. I am quite content.

Mr. BROWN. I think the Senator can assure his constituents that he has voted for a loan to Finland. Let me further say that I do not think such an assurance would be necessary to bring the Senator back here; I believe he would come back anyway. This would not seem like the United States Senate without the brilliant statesman from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator; I hope I may come back; but I am not thinking particularly of the political repercussions. I do not know how my constituents view this question; but I know I should be and will be asked the question, and I want to be able to say that Congress did not screen itself behind a cloak, but that Congress voted to grant a loan to Finland. That is what I want to be able to say.

Mr. BROWN. I shall speak along that general line before I conclude, but let me say in this connection that, like the Senator from Arizona, I would be delighted if we could get through the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives and have enacted a law which would grant Finland credit of $30,000,000 which she might use for any purpose whatsoever. But I find that I meet with opposition from both sides upon that proposition. Many Senators think that we have not gone nearly as far as we should go. On the other hand, many other Senators think that we have gone too far and that we ought to have absolutely nothing to do with loans to a government which is engaged in hostilities.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me further, let me say that on June 26 last—charitable history will probably not perpetuate the address—I said in the Senate we had but two friends in Europe, Finland and Ireland.

Mr. BROWN. I remember when the Senator made that statement.

Mr. ASHURST. I believe that any loan made to Canada, Ireland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, or Finland will be repaid, but that a loan made to any other governments may never be repaid.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Nevada, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, has been on his feet some time and I will yield first to him. I then will yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to assure my friend from Arizona that there is no change made by this bill in the existing law for which I think he voted. The law to which I refer is that creating the Export-Import Bank with a capital of $100,000,000. Its purpose was to aid and facilitate in the export of our surplus crops and commodities. That law is still in existence, and no change will be made in it by the passage of this proposed act at all, except to increase the capital to $200,000,000 and to put on loans limitations which do not now exist in the law; that is all.

Mr. ASHURST. A word further. I have long followed and accepted, and expect to continue to follow and to accept the leadership of the able senior Senator from Nevada on matters relating to our foreign relations.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me say to the Senator that by this bill he is not called on to say whether a loan shall be made to Finland or shall not be made to Finland, whether a loan shall be made to Norway or a loan shall not be made to Norway, or whether a loan shall be made to Sweden or shall not be made to Sweden, at all. There is no such intimation in the bill. The only intimation that can be found in it is that the bill as introduced originally by the Senator from Michigan called for a direct loan of $60,000,000 to Finland. That question is not now before the Senate. There was reported by the Banking and Currency Committee a substitute bill which is exactly the same as the bill reported by the Foreign Relations Committee except that the latter committee wanted an exception made in favor of China. When I say "an exception in favor of China," I mean that the Banking and Currency Committee wanted the total loans to borrowers in any one country limited to $30,000,000. There was no country other than Finland that had an outstanding loan of $10,000,000 except China. That was a question that we had to consider. The bill as reported from the Banking and Currency Committee allows aggregate loans to any one borrower authorized and outstanding at any one time of $30,000,000. The Committee on Foreign Relations adopted an amendment under which Finland will be allowed to apply for a $20,000,000 loan and China will be allowed to apply for a $20,000,000 loan. The bill does not affect any other country whatsoever.

Now let me read——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds further——

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me finish this statement. Reference has been made to what Mr. Jones said in regard to the Finnish loan. I want to read from his testimony, and it will be seen that he has placed Finland on exactly the same plane as every other country in the world, so far as loans for exports are concerned; that is perfectly plain. Everyone knows that the language ought to be changed to read "exports to countries." This is what Mr. Jones said in his testimony before the committee:

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Jones, you have said there is not necessarily any increased credit for Finland in this bill, have you not?

Mr. JONES. I have.

Senator VANDENBERG. You said that if there are increased credits it will depend upon subsequent circumstances. That was your language.

Mr. JONES. No.

Senator VANDENBERG. Yes; you said "circumstances." I wrote it down so that I might ask you what were the circumstances.

Mr. JONES. I did not use the word "subsequent." I said circumstances at the time.

Senator VANDENBERG. That is correct. What circumstances would govern an additional loan to Finland?

Mr. JONES. Everything that might affect the ability of Finland to repay the loan.

Senator VANDENBERG. That would be the only thing you would consider?

Mr. JONES. That would be the only thing I would consider.

I thought I should read that into the RECORD so that there will be no misunderstanding as to Jesse Jones' use of the capital of the Export-Import Bank.

Now, let me say another thing. I will not take time to read it, but he testified that never had he made a loan contrary to the Johnson Act. I do not say "in violation of the Johnson Act," but I say "contrary" to that act, because, I take it, that under the Johnson Act the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could make a loan.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, let me interject a sentence there, with the permission of the Senator from Michigan. I trust that nothing I have said, by any construction, will show a lack of confidence on my part in Mr. Jones. On the contrary, I have great confidence in his integrity and his ability. I think the work he has done has been startling in its excellence and in its worth.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. Jones testified that he had never approved a loan for the export of our goods to any country in controvention of the Johnson Act; that he had never approved a loan for any arms, ammunition, or implements of war, and that he never would. So we have the matter perfectly straight. The question before us is nothing on earth except an increase of the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank to $200,000,000. The Senate voted an increase in its capital to $175,000,000 at the last session, and we are now proposing to place limitations on the use of the money which are not in the act today.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator from Nevada whether he interprets the testimony to which he has just called our attention as forbidding the organization, of which Mr. Jones is the head, loaning to Finland unless he is satisfied that the collateral which may be furnished or the obligation which is made is adequate to meet the final payment?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will admit that, undoubtedly, that is a matter entirely within the discretion of the board of the Export-Import Bank, and we have nothing to go on except the administration of that bank. The bank has been administered well and successfully, and we have the promise of Mr. Jones as to how the money shall be used.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to say a word further, I would prefer an outright loan to Finland. I share the views expressed by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and I would not want the language which has just been read to be construed as forbidding a loan to Finland unless the banking organization was absolutely sure that it would be repaid.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will allow me to interpose right there, let me say that Mr. Jones subsequently stated before the Foreign Relations Committee, on page 23 of the print of the testimony which we have, the following in answer to a question by Senator VANDENBERG as to what he would do in regard to a Finnish loan:

Mr. JONES. I would consider favorably, but not necessarily authorize, a loan, but I would not exclude Finland at this time from consideration of a further loan. I am not certain that I would go as far as $20,000,000 more or $10,000,000 more, but I would not say, "No, we think your cause is hopeless. We do not think your note is good, and therefore we will lend you no more money." I would not say that to Finland.

Mr. KING. I am very glad the Senator has called our attention to that statement. Personally, if I shall vote for this bill, I shall vote for it with the understanding that Mr. Jones and the organization of which he is the distinguished head shall make a loan to Finland of not to exceed $30,000,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not desire to take the time of the Senator from Michigan from his argument, but I think that the Senator from Nevada made a statement that should not be permitted to go unchallenged. The Senator from Nevada a moment ago said that the question of a loan to Finland was not before the Senate.

I call attention to the fact that the bill before the Senate is Senate bill 3069, introduced by the Senator from Michigan, who now holds the floor, and is entitled "A bill to provide for certain loans to the Republic of Finland by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation," and that it provides for a direct loan to the Republic of Finland to be made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That is the measure which is before the Senate for consideration at the present moment.

Mr. KING. That is dead.

Mr. HERRING. We have changed the last paragraph.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that a substitute has been reported.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, what the Senator says is technically true from the parliamentary standpoint; but the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] obtained unanimous consent that the substitute or amendment which is now before us should be considered as the bill now pending before the Senate for action. While it is technically true that it strikes out the language of the original bill introduced by the Senator from Michigan, that language is not in fact now before us.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senate has already ordered the substitution of the amendment for the original bill, then I am in error.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That happened while I was out of the Chamber. I am very sorry it happened in my absence, because it was my purpose to oppose the substitution of that language for the language of the original bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator may offer any amendment he desires to offer, anyway.

Mr. DANAHER, Mr. BAILEY, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. BROWN. Before I yield to the Senator from Connecticut, to whom I think I should yield next, and then the Senator from North Carolina, I desire to repeat that which every Member of the Senate well knows, but to repeat now as part of this argument, the indebtedness of foreign governments to the United States, in round figures.

Belgium today owes us $457,000,000; Czechoslovakia, $165,000,000; Estonia, $21,000,000—all in default.

Finland owes us $8,142,000, which is current, up to date, with interest and principal paid to date according to agreement.

France owes us $4,200,000,000; Germany-Austria, $26,000,000; Great Britain, $5,574,000,000; Greece, $34,000,000; Hungary, $2,000,000; Italy, $2,025,000,000; Latvia, $8,700,000; Lithuania, $7,000,000; Poland, $266,000,000; Rumania, $64,000,000; Yugoslavia, $61,000,000.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BROWN. In every instance I have named, except the little Finnish Republic which we are talking about today, and which the majority of us, I believe, want to help, the debtors are in default. Finland is not in default, but is current and up to date.

I now yield, first to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Michigan, and I will say to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN] that I shall be brief. I want simply to recall, if I may, to the mind of the Senator from Michigan that when Mr. Jones was before our committee we asked him how it was that he authorized a loan of $10,000,000 to the Finnish-American Trading Co. He told us, did he not, that the corporation had a million dollars of paid-in capital, and he considered that as long as there was a million dollars of paid-in capital, he was justified in figuring that amount, at 10 percent, the basis of a possible maximum loan of $10,000,000 at that time? Does the Senator recall that statement?

Mr. BROWN. I say to the Senator that that is undoubtedly true. I have no doubt that that is what he said.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point? In addition to the fact that the Finnish-American Trading Corporation had the million-dollar capital, it was because of the fact that Mr. Jones thought the loan was good because of Finland's credit and the circumstances that surrounded it. It was not simply that he could get $10,000,000 back out of $1,000,000.

Mr. DANAHER. I cannot say it all at once.

Mr. ADAMS. The testimony was that the loan was guaranteed by the Finnish Government.

Mr. DANAHER. Precisely.

Mr. President, so that we may have the record straight, let me say to the Senator from Michigan that I took pretty exact notes in longhand of Mr. Jones' testimony, and immediately dictated it to my secretary when I returned to my office. Just as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] has said, Mr. Jones also required that the Finnish Government guarantee that loan, as he used the expression, "for a modest amount." Those were his very words. He said that he took up the matter with the Secretary of State, with the Secretary of the Treasury, and with the President, and they all approved the $10,000,000 authorization; and then he said—and now I quote exactly——

> We would not go any above the $10,000,000 unless you told us to.

Mr. BROWN. I do not recall his testimony that way at all. I have a very distinct recollection on that point. I disagree with the Senator.

Mr. DANAHER. All right. Let me add that he also told us that in inquiring into the credit status of Finland he took into account her payments up to date; he took into account the fact that she had $2,000,000 of exports annually, and $180,000,000 of imports annually; that she had a favorable balance of trade of $20,000,000; that she had money on deposit in banks in Paris and in London and some in New York; and, taking all of those circumstances into consideration, he felt that she was good for $10,000,000. He pointed out that all during December she had not taken even 5 cents of the loan. He pointed out that at the time he testified, in January, she had taken or committed only $830,000 of it. He pointed out that there was a possible and probable commitment of $2,500,000 at that time, and whether she would ever go beyond the $10,000,000 he did not know; whether she would ever come back for more beyond the $10,000,000 he did not know; and whether she would ever get another dime depended on the circumstances at the date of her taking up the whole $10,000,000.

I will ask the Senator from Michigan if that is not a substantially accurate résumé of what Mr. Jones said.

Mr. BROWN. The hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee were not printed.

Mr. DANAHER. I know that.

Mr. BROWN. And, according to my recollection, they were not taken down. It is most difficult for me to recall all the things Mr. Jones said. I am in distinct disagreement with the Senator's statement that Mr. Jones intimated that he could not go beyond $10,000,000. I disagree principally because I have just read to the Senate a statement from Mr. Jones' printed testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee to the effect that he would favorably consider a loan of an additional amount; he said perhaps not of the entire $20,000,000, perhaps not all of the $10,000,000, but that he would consider it favorably.

I further disagree with the Senator's recollection as to the amount which the Finnish authorities want. The Senator may be correct that Mr. Jones said, back in early January, when we had the hearing, that Finland had not been taking more than a few hundred thousand dollars. I know that they now want the entire $10,000,000, and that they have applied for more aid, which will be provided by this bill. So I am not in agreement with the Senator's recollection.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one moment further?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. With the Senator's permission, then, I should like to introduce two articles, one from the Washington Star and the other from the Washington Post, purporting to quote the statements of Mr. Jesse Jones made immediately following that hearing.

Mr. BROWN. Of course, the Senator can place those statements in the RECORD without objection from me; but no reporter from the Washington Post or from the Evening Star was present.

Mr. DANAHER. That is true.

Mr. BROWN. I was present, and I was about as much interested in the bill as anyone, and I think I have a fairly good idea of the general attitude of the Federal Loan Administrator toward the Finnish loan.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BROWN. I must yield first to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I was very much interested in, and I think greatly enlightened by, the inquiry of the distinguished Senator from Arizona, and the answers. I gather that the Senator from Arizona may now go home. into his campaign, with this assurance: If anyone in Arizona complains of him that he voted for a loan to Finland, he can say, "Oh, no; I did not vote for a loan to Finland. I voted to give the Export-Import Bank some money. I did not think about any loan to Finland." If there should be some Bolshevist in that State—of course I do not think there is—who would complain of him, he could say, "Why I have not offended you. I did not vote for anything for Finland." But if, on the next day, he should meet some friend of Finland—some man who had been greatly stirred by the gallantry of that little nation, standing there and fighting for her life—he might say, "I understood you said on yesterday that you did not vote for any loan for Finland. I am going to vote against you." The Senator would say, "Oh, yes; I did. I voted for a loan for Finland, because I was assured by Mr. Jesse Jones that that was exactly what he was going to do with the money." [Laughter.]

I think that is a very fortunate circumstance for all of us Senators. We can answer either way we please; and I notice that the bill is dated January 25, which is the month of the two-faced god Janus. [Laughter.]

I should like to ask the Senator a plain question. In considering this legislation, am I to consider that I am voting to increase the capital of the Export-Import Bank in a blanket way, with no conception of what they are going to do; or am I to realize that on one hand I intend to aid China against Japan, and, on the other, Finland against Russia?

That is the reality. I am willing to debate the matter on that ground, but I am not willing to fool myself, or undertake to fool my constituents.

Mr. BROWN. Of course, the Senator from North Carolina realizes that the record which has been made in the introduction of the bill, the hearing before the Banking and Currency Committee, which unfortunately was not taken down, and certainly before the Foreign Relations Committee, where the testimony was taken down in full, plainly indicates that the reason which has primarily brought this matter before the Senate now is the situation in Finland.

Mr. BAILEY. And the purpose is to aid Finland in resistance to the aggression of Russia?

Mr. BROWN. No; I do not say that. That was my original purpose.

Mr. BAILEY. Shall I dismiss that motive from my mind altogether?

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will let me say a few more words, I will try to disabuse his mind on that subject.

Mr. KING. He will not dismiss it from his mind with my consent.

Mr. BROWN. This bill—and we cannot get away from the fact—is a bill which increases the loanable authority of the Export-Import Bank. The record back of it clearly shows that the two committees fully considered the Finnish loan proposition, and I think it is fair to assume, from the testimony which we heard read by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations that if this authorization is made Finland will be enabled to use the capital of the Export-Import Bank for the purpose of purchasing nonmilitary supplies in the United States. That is not as far as I would like to go, but it is as far as this bill goes, and I do not think any Senator can vote for the bill without assuming that Finland will be aided by the passage of the bill, provided the Federal Loan Administrator thinks the loan is reasonably safe and, second, provided the funds are not to be used for the purchase of war supplies which are prohibited by the President's proclamation with respect to our neutrality.

Mr. BAILEY. Will not the Senator also say that that is the motive for the proposed legislation, and that it would never have been before us, and he would not have introduced the original bill, but for the inducement of the heroic attitude of Finland and her desperate situation?

Mr. BROWN. The Senator confuses two matters. First, I introduced an original bill for the purpose of aiding the Finnish Government in their defense against the aggression of the Russian Empire, or the Russian Republic, or whatever it may be called. I cannot say that the bill would not be here if it had not been for the Finnish situation, because it was here last August, when the Committee on Banking and Currency reported a bill authorizing an increase in the capital of the Export-Import Bank in the amount of $100,000,000. The Senate passed the bill after lopping $25,000,000 off that figure, and the bill died because Congress adjourned before the House of Representatives considered it. But it is here now as a result of my introduction of the Finnish loan bill.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the Senator; but I seem to have very great difficulty in getting an answer on the particular point. The Senator says that the original bill introduced by him was introduced in behalf of Finland and in order to aid her in the present struggle; but he says that when it got into the Committee on Foreign Relations all that was dismissed, and it becomes now a general matter.

Mr. BROWN. I know the Senator wants to be accurate historically speaking. It was in the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. BAILEY. In the Committee on Banking and Currency, and afterward in the Committee on Foreign Relations, was it not? I notice that the bill was reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] on January 25, legislative day of January 23, having been introduced by the Senator from Michigan on the 8th day of January, and I notice that it was reported by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with an amendment to the amendment, on February 7. So I think I was historically accurate. I do not think I was wrong about it. It has been before both committees.

I wish to be candid and frank. I have had a great deal of correspondence from people in my State about this matter and I have had much of concern about it. I have always thought of it as providing a loan to Finland to aid Finland in her resistance to Russia. I was told this morning that I must not think of it any more along that line.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator was not told that by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is the general impression.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to conclude, then I will not speak any more. Then we are told that we are not helping China against Japan; that we are buying tin from China.

This, after all, is the Senate of the United States. Little boys down the alley can deceive themselves, and hope to deceive others, but Senators cannot propose even to try to deceive themselves, and they cannot hope to deceive others.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt——

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Michigan is not trying to deceive.

Mr. BROWN. I think it is very unfair to say that anyone, either the Senator from Michigan or the members of either the Committee on Foreign Relations or the Committee on Banking and Currency, is attempting to deceive.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not mean that they are.

Mr. BROWN. With the Senator from North Carolina, we could not do that; he is too keen.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not think you could do it, and I am not stating you are attempting to do it.

Mr. BROWN. And I am not attempting to deceive the people of the United States. I have been very frank about this matter.

Mr. BAILEY. I would not say the Senator has ever been other than perfectly frank. I do not intend to reflect on him. My statement was probably a little bold and rhetorical, but certainly I did not intend to reflect on anyone. I would not do it.

This is what has occurred to me: It is made to appear that we do not intend by this action to provide money to aid Finland in her struggle. As a matter of fact, we know we are. It is being made to appear that we do not intend to lend money to the low countries to help them in the event of an invasion. As a matter of fact, I think it is in contemplation. It would be made to appear that we do not intend to be of assistance to China in resisting Japan. As a matter of fact, we know where this money will go, and that it will help China. That is what I meant to say.

Mr. President, I am willing to face the facts as they are and debate to a conclusion this matter of the power of the Congress to provide loans to aid desperate nations in their struggles against aggressors. I think that is the question. But I am unwilling to cover that matter up and do by indirection—and I say that with all due deference—under color of increasing the capital of the Export-Import Bank, what I would not be willing to do directly. I am willing to front the issue. That is about all I wish to say. I can debate that issue, but I cannot debate the other one.

There can be no objection to money being put into the hands of the Export-Import Bank or the R. F. C. We have done it over and over again, and there is no debate about that. But we are asked deliberately to take that course, and then say that Mr. Jesse Jones will do the rest, and we can say we knew nothing about it. That is my elaboration of my statement. But I wish to say to the Senator that I would not reflect on him on any account. The Senator's original object was sufficiently direct, but this bill puts me in the position of voting $100,000,000 to the Export-Import Bank and exculpating myself of responsibility as to where they lend it or how it is to be loaned. I would much rather deal with the direct situation.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to say to the Senator that, in my judgment, if he votes for this bill, which authorizes the Federal Loan Administrator to lend as much as $30,000,000 to Finland; and if he votes to place upon it the restrictions which are placed in the bill, he certainly will have his full measure of responsibility for any loan made under the bill. If we authorize Mr. Jones to do it, then we cannot later stand aside and say, "You should not have done this thing. We told you you could go that far if in your judgment the conditions permitted it, and you were wrong." We are authorizing the Federal Loan Administrator to lend as much as $30,000,000 for the purchase of agricultural products by the Finnish nation. I do not think anything the Senator can say will absolve him from responsibility, nor do I think anything he has said can take from him the credit for his vote, because I think that if he votes for the bill he will be entitled to credit for it as a vote for a loan to Finland.

Mr. BAILEY. Then if he lends money to Sweden or Norway or Holland, I have the same responsibility, have I not?

Mr. BROWN. I think so.

Mr. BAILEY. We will bring that home to the Senate, too. If we are going into the business of, blindfolded, taking responsibility for such loans up to the limit fixed in the bill as Mrs. Jesse Jones may make, that is our responsibility. I am willing to debate that, too.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. BROWN. Let me say, before the majority leader proceeds, that I have been on my feet for an hour and a half, and I am perfectly willing to stand and wait a longer time, but I should like to make a few general observations with regard to the Finnish loan which I think will be of interest to those who are interested in the bill. I have never refused to be interrupted or refused to yield, but I should like to proceed with the main tenor of my remarks, and I assure Senators I will not be long. I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I would not trespass on the Senator's time except to make a comment on one observation made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] to the effect that if it were not for the Finnish situation this bill would not be here.

While it is true that the bill introduced by the Senator from Michigan is the vehicle to which this proposition is attached at this time, it is not true that, even if that bill had not been introduced, and there had been no conflict between Russia and Finland, this proposal would not be here, because before the Senator introduced his bill dealing directly with Finland the recommendation for an increase in the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank had been repeated. That recommendation was made nearly a year ago by the President and by Mr. Jones, and Mr. Jones came before the Committee on Banking and Currency urging a $100,000,000 increase in order to facilitate the exportation of American products. The Senate passed a bill with a $75,000,000 increase before there was any war in Europe. So, while the proposal might not be here today as an amendment or substitute for the bill introduced by the Senator from Michigan, it would be here at this session, because it would have been brought before the committee, and I think the committee would have done what it has done now; that is, would have recommended an increase in the capital stock of the bank.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I believe that my own views have been sufficiently outlined. I think one of the main reasons this bill is here is that many of us in Congress desire to aid the Finnish people in the defense of their homes and firesides from those who now assail Finland. Naturally one of the questions that comes to the mind of Members of a legislative body is whether or not this action may be taken with reasonable safety. I wish to occupy about 5 minutes to tell a little about the Finnish Republic.

It is roughly the size of the State of California or the State of Montana in area. Its population is almost 4,000,000. Seventy-eight percent of the population is rural and 22 percent is urban.

Its exports consist mainly of timber and the products of the forest. Those to the United States are largely pulp and sulfide. Over the 5-year period immediately preceding the present difficulty, its normal exports exceeded imports by about $128,000,000. In 1938 its exports amounted to $180,000,000.

Its foreign trade is 33 percent with the British, 16 percent with the Germans, 8 percent with the people of the United States. Germany and England are Finland's largest customers. Only 1 percent of the trade of Finland is with Russia, or was with Russia before the outbreak of hostilities.

The principal imports from the United States are first, cotton; second, oil; and third, cereals. They form, I think, approximately 70 percent of the total imports from the United States.

Now, in respect to the Finnish record as to payment of debts, everyone knows that she is the only European country to which we loaned money during and after the World War that is current and up to date in her obligations. She owes today in round figures $8,000,000. She paid her last installment of $250,000 on December 15 last, after the outbreak of hostilities with the Soviet Republics.

The Finns not only have a perfect record of payment of debts since the World War, but during the 100 years from the time when the Russian Empire took what was then known as the Duchy of Finland, down to the World War, their record for payment of debts has been excellent. As a subdivision of the Russian Empire, Finland borrowed extensively in France and in England during that period. During that entire 100-year period Finland paid every dollar of principal and interest it borrowed, either from private sources or from the governments of European nations.

The state debt of Finland at the present time is $22,000,000. That is a per capita debt of $6. When one stops to consider that the Federal per capita debt in the United States is about $285, and the total per capita debt, inclusive of the Federal, State, and municipal debt, is about $450 per capita, he can get some idea of the credit rating the Finnish Government has. Her debt represents $6 per capita. Her current debt is far less than was her current annual income before the outbreak of hostilities.

Finland's governmental economy has been excellent. I must disagree with the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] in respect to the Finnish governmental loans, particularly with respect to the statements he made on the floor of the Senate yesterday. The amount of borrowing by the Finnish Government in the United States has been approximately $70,000,000 since the war. The balance of some $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 is in the form of borrowings by the Finnish Government-owned railroads or corporations which were adjuncts of the Government of Finland.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me ask the Senator if he said that the total Finnish national debt amounts to $6 per capita?

Mr. BROWN. Yes; $6 per capita.

Mr. BAILEY. And our national debt is $45,000,000,000. We have about 130,000,000 population. That would mean that our debt would represent $330 per capita?

Mr. BROWN. Two hundred and eighty-five dollars.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, it has risen since the Senator got his figures. But taking the Senator's figures, the United States Government debt represents $285 per capita, and that of Finland $6 per capita. I think we ought to borrow some money from them. [Manifestations of laughter and applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BROWN. Of course, Finland assailed, as she is, has no funds to loan.

At the end of 1938 Finland had paid all but $19,000,000 of its American indebtedness, between $8,000,000 and $9,000,000 of which is the debt which is current, so far as the United States is concerned. The balance of about $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 is the amount of Finnish governmental or Finnish governmental corporation bonds in the hands of the American people.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] submitted a resolution which, after slight amendment, was adopted by the Senate yesterday. I am in complete agreement with the views of the Senator from Mississippi in that respect. I think we should encourage those of the American people who can do so, to purchase Finnish bonds which are not in any way restricted as to the use of the money. What I point out is that, of course, the success of such a plan is quite uncertain. The need of the Finnish Republic at the present time is acute. If they are going to have any aid in their battle with Russia they need it quickly. We can act in the Senate today or on Monday. The House, I think, will consider this bill with reasonable expedition. A substantial credit can be given by this method to the Finnish Government.

What I now say may not be wise in the sense of its aiding in the passage of this bill, but I speak as one who is a friend of the Finnish Republic, one who wants to see them succeed in their struggle. I call attention to the fact that there are many materials which may be purchased in this country which will be of great aid to the civilian population of Finland, and will take from the Finnish Government much of the burden which they would otherwise have to assume, and release for military purposes large sums of their own money which would otherwise have to be used for the civilian population.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact—and I will give many items—that many articles valuable in war which may be purchased under this measure are excluded from the proclamation that the President made under the Neutrality Act, defining munitions of war. I wish to give them to the Senate briefly.

In the line of transportation: Horses, mules, harness, saddles, wagons, rolling stock, railroad equipment, motortrucks, automobiles, boats, motorboats, pontoons, bridges. It must be remembered that the transportation facilities of Finland are mainly used in connection with water. There are 2,500 miles of waterways in the Republic of Finland. The great bulk of their freight is carried by water.

In the realm of shelter and personal equipment: Canvas tents, blankets, sleeping bags, clothing, shoes, boots, mittens, socks, civilian gas masks, binoculars, parachutes.

In the line of food and medicine—and remember that cereals constitute one of the three largest imports into Finland from the United States—are cereals, forage, hay, oats, straw, searchlights, electrical equipment, radio equipment, barbed wire, which is very valuable, of course, in any defensive operation, and on the part of Finland the war there is purely defensive.

Under the provisions of this measure all the commodities mentioned could be bought by the Finns. They are all of such a nature that the Finns could legitimately ask for loans from the Export-Import Bank for their purchase, because all of them are either manufactured or agricultural products of the United States, which we have in surplus quantities today.

These statements refute the contentions of those who say that this measure cannot aid the Finns to any extent in their battle. Under the provisions of the pending bill the Finns would be able to purchase many commodities which would be of great benefit to them in the defense of their country.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. When a country is at war is not any financial or economic aid of military value, because it enables the country to maintain its economic set-up?

Mr. BROWN. It releases other funds.

Mr. CONNALLY. It releases other funds which can be devoted to military purposes.

Mr. BROWN. I think there is no question about that.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is not every dollar which a nation at war obtains that much military aid?

Mr. BROWN. It certainly would be of benefit to them.

Much has been said to the effect that Mr. Jones would not lend much, if anything, to the Finnish people. In the first place, the President asked for a bill of this kind, and in the second paragraph of the message which he sent to Congress, after the introductory remarks, he said that, in his judgment, the American people desired that we help the Finns if we could do so within the limits of our neutrality. He said:

> There is without doubt in the United States a great desire for some action to assist Finland to finance the purchase of agricultural surpluses and manufactured products, not including implements of war.

So far as I am concerned, I should like to go considerably further than that. Again quoting:

> There is at the same time undoubted opposition to the creation of precedents which might lead to large credits to nations in Europe, either belligerents or neutrals.

We have taken care of that matter by the Johnson Act and by the provisions of the Neutrality Act, which we passed a couple of months ago, which make it impossible to lend money to any of the countries that are in default to us.

The President said further:

> The facts in regard to Finland are just as fully in the possession of every Member of Congress as they are in the executive branch of the Government. The matter of credits to that Republic is wholly within the jurisdiction of the Congress.

I read that to show that the purpose of the message was to call the Finnish situation to the attention of the Congress. It is plain the President wanted authority to loan. Mr. Jones is his agent.

I have already stated that Mr. Jones, in his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee, strongly intimated that he would grant further loans to Finland if conditions at the time the application was made caused the loan to appear to be safe.

I call attention to the fact that he has already advanced $10,000,000 to Finland under circumstances that were not quite as safe as they are today. The Finns have demonstrated remarkable defensive military power. They have held the Russians off for more than 2 months. If it was safe to lend them money when we all contemplated the immediate overrunning of the Finnish Republic by the tremendously superior Russian forces in early December and late November, certainly, after that little nation has demonstrated its military power to stop the Russians, I think it would appeal to any administrator that it is safer to lend money now than it was then.

I call attention to the fact that the defeat of Finland in this war—if such we may call it—would not mean the end of the Finnish Republic, first, because, if the Allied powers are eventually successful, it is fair to assume that the Finnish Republic will again be set up as an independent government. I have called attention to their debt-paying record in the 100 years that they were a grand duchy of Russia; and I am satisfied that if the Export-Import Bank authorizes this credit, if the Finns are overrun by the soldiers of the Soviet Republic and if the Allies are eventually successful, this money will come back to us.

Mr. President, suppose it should not be paid? Suppose we should lose the entire sum of $30,000,000? That would represent a loss per capita to the American people of 25 cents—25 cents for each of us. It seems to me that would be a very small price to pay for that which 90 percent of the American people earnestly desire—the stopping of the advance of the Russian Army upon the Mannerheim line in Finland, where it is stopped today.

Others may view without emotion the spectacle of the mighty Russian nation, the most extensive in the world, with the largest standing army in the world, attacking a small, peaceful, inoffensive nation. I cannot. Russia outnumbers Finland in population almost 50 to 1. Without the slightest provocation, on a demand for cession of territory and the establishment of naval and military bases which no nation could grant and retain its self-respect, this modern barbarian power—and I cannot call it else—launched its attack in the dead of winter, when the roads over Finland's lakes were open. A fervor of patriotism has so far enabled this little nation to stop—nay, repeatedly to defeat the Russians. Their stand has aroused the admiration of the world. Their fight is purely defensive. Their sole objective is the defense of their nation, their Government, their homes, and their people.

Mr. President, our people still love justice. We appreciate honor and integrity. We are now living in a realistic world. Senators may say that we have no interest in the outcome. We may refuse the paltry aid suggested by this bill—a contribution, as I have said, of 25 cents per capita from the American people. Our refusal may result in the spread of an unholy doctrine which will plague us; nay, possibly destroy us, in the years to come. If in our judgment a small loan to this brave people will stop the spread of communism throughout the Scandinavian countries, I say that it is money well spent.

I know the superb citizenship that Sweden, Norway, and Finland have given us. If I can stop this menace without risk to my country, I want to do it. We shall not worry about a few million dollars if we lose it all. Russia will not turn her guns upon the shores of the United States, because it is impossible for her to do so. We can take this action without serious risk. Not to do it may be more dangerous to our country.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I address myself to the bill, Senate bill 3069, and to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Michigan, because the amendment to the bill raises the identical questions which I raised in the Senate on January 8 of this year. The questions are as follows:

First. Can the Congress of the United States loan money to Finland, directly or indirectly, without violating international law?

Second. Under our constitutional form of government, has the Congress the authority to make a loan or a gift of the people's money to Finland?

I am asking a third question: Irrespective of international law and constitutional authority, would it be a wise course for Congress to follow, when this Nation is at peace, to make a loan or a gift of money out of the Treasury of the United States to a nation which is at war? Would it not establish a new foreign policy?

Mr. President, in my remarks on January 8 I reached the conclusion that such a loan would be in violation of international law, would violate the power of Congress, and would establish a new foreign policy, opening the door for pressure groups and demands all down the highway of the future.

Mr. President, already there have been received at my office resolutions adopted by other foreign groups asking that I support bills which have been or may be introduced into the Congress similar to the one introduced in behalf of Finland.

Today, bleeding, dismembered Poland calls to us for help. She has an army in the field in France. There are many more Polish people in this country than there are Finns. Czechoslovakia is in the same boat, and many Czechoslovakians are now citizens of this land.

Mr. President, we stood and we still stand for the open door in China, but I cannot stand for the open door to the American Treasury, especially as I interpret my duties and obligations as a United States Senator under the Constitution. I am foreclosed while this country is at peace from becoming a party to any step which would lead toward that open-door policy to the American Treasury, which we know would lead dangerously close to the precipice of war.

I love Finland; I feel for her in the great crisis which she is facing; but I love America more. Because I take the step that I am now taking I want no one to feel that I am not moved by the noble deeds and heroic efforts the Finns are making, and I want no one to say that, personally, I am unwilling to help Finland. I want to make clear, so clear that those who come after us cannot fail to understand, that we in this Congress see a difference between official action taken by the Government and the acts of individuals or groups of individuals.

Like all the other Members of this great body, I am a trustee, a trustee with limited powers, a trustee of something that is very much worth while. As such a trustee it is my function to keep that which is entrusted to me intact and transfer this, the great American inheritance of freedom, to future generations.

Let me digress for a moment to read into the RECORD a letter that was brought to my desk last night, a letter which George Washington wrote to Patrick Henry. It is dated Philadelphia, October 9, 1795, and reads:

> MY DEAR SIR: I have persuaded myself, sir, that a crisis is approaching that must, if it cannot be arrested, soon decide whether order in good government shall be preserved or anarchy and confusion ensue. My ardent desire is to keep the United States free from political connections with every other country, to see us independent of all, and under the influence of none. In a word, I want an American character, that the powers of Europe may be convinced we act for ourselves and not for others. This, in my judgment, is the only way to be respected abroad and happy at home.
> I am, my dear sir, your most obedient and affectionate servant,
> G. WASHINGTON.

Mr. President, recently one of the great newspapers of my State published an editorial addressed to me in which, among other things, it was said that because of my Norwegian ancestry I was in position to play a very influential role in this debate. The editorial said that I represented more people of Scandinavian descent than any other United States Senator, with two or three possible exceptions, and it brought to my attention the fact that I must know that the defeat of Finland by Russia would mean the invasion of Norway and Sweden. The editorial suggested that thousands of my constituents telegraph me and urge a change of viewpoint. The editorial concluded:

We do not believe that Senator WILEY will be representing the people of Wisconsin unless he does so. We believe that if he fails to do so he will be held to account for it in his next election.

My answer to that editorial was a copy of the remarks that I made in the Senate on October 8. I said further in my letter:

I am more confirmed than ever that the position I have taken is the correct one. The fact that the bill S. 3069 pending in the United States Senate, which will come up for action soon, says nothing about a loan to Finland, but simply increases the capital of the Export-Import Bank from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000, is confirmatory very decisively of the position that I have taken.

And we have heard considerably about what Jesse Jones said in the committee—

Jesse Jones, the head of the Export-Import Bank, recently stated that he would not make any loan unless it were a good loan, which means no loan will be made. The bankers have turned it down on that basis.

This bill will provide no aid for Finland. It will be detrimental to Finland. This bill is mere camouflage and delusions.

As was suggested by the Senator from South Carolina this morning—

The Export-Import Bank is created for the purpose of fostering American trade between nations at peace. Even if the loan should be made, it would not be used for the purpose of marketing war materials. Let us be frank. Finland needs war materials. She needs airplanes. Every day's delay here may prove serious.

The best thing that could happen for Finland would be the defeat of this bill. Then, as I said in my remarks to the Senate, the people would respond.

We have been told this morning that 25 cents per head would do the job.

I have personally sent my check to help Finland, but as long as the people feel the Government will give some aid they are not going to give aid. Your editorial, in part, does not seem to distinguish between the acts of the citizens of a country and the official acts of the country. This country has not sold war supplies to Japan, but citizens of this country have. This country has not loaned money to China, but the Export-Import Bank has loaned it to a corporation in this country for the purpose of expediting the sale of our domestic products, which does not include munitions or implements of war. When you say that Finland technically—is not a belligerent you mean that she is not a belligerent technically within our Embargo Act; but within the meaning of international law she is a belligerent.

And here is the point that is urged so often—

I said further—

You have apparently, as your editorial indicates, been given information by certain interested foreigners, the same as was given to me in Washington. The best way to secure America from the invasion of foreign armies and foreign ideas is for the American people to understand our republican form of government. It is good practice to tie to a principle.

Even here in the United States Senate.

I realize that the lay mind, especially when it is swept by emotion, has little time for considering constitutional authority or the significance of international law. But right there is where, if one is guided by principle, one will not let hysteria or emotionalism or political expediency divert him from his course.

If we don't want to violate international law; if we don't want to breach the Constitution; if we don't want to set a new precedent for a new foreign policy in order to help Finland, then all we have to do—we the people—is to dig down into our individual jeans. We are told that a loan to Finland might insure her success in the fight against Russia. If this is true, then a gift by the American people will be more effective. The argument is also heard that in making this loan we would be safeguarding our vital interests of today and of the future. If the American people themselves—make the loan, or the gift, this will also be true, and we will not be opening the door which might lead this Nation into becoming an international banker friend for all our foreign friends.

I do not expect the European mind—I have told those who called on me the same—to understand our form of government. But Norway as a government hasn't loaned money to Finland. Sweden as a government hasn't loaned money to Finland, and as far as I know no other government has done so. Many of the foreign governments through their parliaments or congresses have the power to do so, but they recognize that would be an act of war, a violation of international law. But the people over there are aiding Finland. The Swedish people have given $15,000,000. Let us—the people of this country—do likewise and avoid Government or official action. If the people make a gift we will not have a financial stake in Finland.

Then we will have fulfilled an obligation individually and as groups, without involving the Nation.

Mr. President, this bill should be defeated because it is a roundabout way of pretending to do something that cannot be done directly, to wit, loan money to Finland. I know some will say, as has been said this morning, that the loan will not be made to Finland but will be made to some independent corporation in this country; that it will not be made by our Government, but will be made by an arm of the Government, known as the Export-Import Bank. That is merely a subterfuge.

We reach the conclusion, then—and let us be frank about it—that Finland needs war material; she needs airplanes, and delay in getting materials and airplanes may prove very serious.

We reach the further conclusion that this bill is merely camouflage and a delusion, because it will not provide for Finland the aid she needs, and it will be detrimental to Finland in that, as I have indicated, it will interfere with donations and with subscriptions to a bond issue, if a bond issue should go through.

I believe there is unanimity among the American people that they would like to see Finland aided. They feel Finland merits aid. However, I know that the American people are deeply conscious of a conviction that they do not want to do anything or have Congress do anything that will tend to endanger the peace of America. The American people want us to use our heads and see if there is any practical and legal way by which a gift or a loan may be made to Finland. In that connection the question naturally arises, should the Congress make such a loan or gift? As we approach this subject, we particularly, who have been given, as I have said, a trust and responsibility and to whom the country looks with confidence for wise, moderate, patriotic, and healing counsels, are confronted with these questions: Would a loan to Finland breach international law, violate our Constitution, and create a new foreign policy?

We know that the solution will never be found through the pathway of emotionalism and hysteria or fear, which lead only to unbalanced judgment.

It is my contention, and I think the law that I shall cite sustains me, that the Congress of the United States, under international law, has no right to loan or give money to Finland. In other words, it is my contention that under international law a neutral state is forbidden to grant loans to or open credit for a combatant nation during the duration of the war. We cannot get away from this international principle by saying there is no war within international law and the recognized principles of common sense, because there is a war between Finland and Russia. If anyone doubts that, he should read the newspapers or go to the Finnish front and stand on the Mannerheim line, and then go to France. From a visit at the western front, one might conclude there was no war in France, but this is not true in Finland.

Under international law—and I am talking about the law of nations—war exists when two or more states have their armed forces fighting each other. Many of my brethren here do not seem to appreciate that fact. Under the same law it is the duty and the obligation of the government of a neutral state to abstain from all participation in the conflict. The extent of the duty of abstention is broad. Every possible field of activity is covered. Money cannot be loaned, neither can credit be extended, by a neutral government to a belligerent, for that amounts to participation in war and constitutes, therefore, unneutral conduct. I cite Hyde, International Law, volume II, pages 698 and 699.

There are those who contend that there is no war in Europe, because neither the President nor Congress has taken steps under the so-called Embargo Act. The Embargo Act is not international law; it is domestic law.

We have stood as a nation for law and order. We have stood for international law. We are standing for it now, through our State Department. This is no time for us to become an exponent of the breach of international law—a lawbreaker.

Some contend that the following provision of the Habana Convention of 1928, which provides that—

> Credits that a neutral state may give to facilitate the sale or exportation of its food products and raw materials are not included in this prohibition—

Is applicable, and gives permission to do what is now contemplated by the bill pending in the Senate. The answer to that contention is that the Habana Convention is international law only in the Western Hemisphere. The signatories to that agreement were 29 nations of North and South America.

We are contending now with Japan, in relation to the Nine Power Treaty, that it cannot be changed without the consent of all the signatories. We should put ourselves in a very poor position if we should contend now, as some do, that international law can be changed at our whim and fancy.

In order to avoid being drawn into foreign wars, the United States, by its present so-called neutrality law, denies to its citizens many of the rights to trade and travel to belligerent countries which citizens of neutral nations ordinarily enjoy under international law. Before these laws have been well tested, it is now proposed by some folk that the United States Government itself violate its neutrality and make a loan to Finland, now at war with the Soviet Union. By taking sides officially in this conflict, the United States would take far greater risks of involvement than by returning to a simple assertion and maintenance of customary neutrality rights for itself and its citizens.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WILEY. I do.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have to leave the city to keep an engagement at Cambridge, Md., tonight. It is quite possible that this measure may come up for a vote before I can return. I have asked the Senator from Wisconsin if he will yield to me in order that I may make a brief statement. I hope no other Senator will take the floor until he can secure it again, because of his courtesy in giving me this opportunity.

Does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. WILEY. I do.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of this bill, particularly as it is drawn.

In the first place, I can see no international involvement at all in it. It is a perfectly legitimate commercial transaction, proposed to be conducted through the Export-Import Bank. In the main, all it does is to promote the sale of American agricultural and manufactured products through that governmental agency. I hope, however, that one of the loans that will be made under the bill will be a loan to Finland.

The reason I am for such a loan is, first, that the Finns, of all the nations that received financial assistance from us after the World War, have religiously and promptly paid back the installments on their debt to us each and every time they have come due; and now, when their credit has been proven to be good, and they are in real need of further credit, and the money is to be expended in the United States anyway, and we are spending so much money to promote agriculture and industry together, it seems to me to be in line with the main governmental policy to pass this bill. While I appreciate that Russia has a right to have any kind of government its citizens want, whether it is communism, democracy, fascism, or nazi-ism, I have a right, too, to feel, as I do, sympathy for Finland, which is being invaded, irrespective of her form of government.

Of the 18 national heroes of the Russian revolution, the men most responsible for bringing on that revolution and establishing the present government in Russia, and who were told off to stand as an honor guard at the coffin of Lenin at the time that coffin was lying in state, 14 have already been "purged," showing the character of the Russian Government at present—"purging" 14 of its so-called national heroes, the leaders in the revolution! God only knows how many millions of persons starved to death when the Soviet Government years ago took the grain from the kulaks and left them without food. Heaven only knows how many millions were shot down in the revolution itself, for no crime in particular but because of mass and class hatred. Heaven only knows how many hundreds of thousands in Russia have been executed in purges of one kind or another. With the great struggle going on in Finland, I cannot see why, apart from our Government, as citizens—and this is not an intervention in that war—we should not have the greatest sympathy—aye, constructive sympathy—for this little Nation and help it stem the tide of barbarism, a remnant of the Dark Ages.

Any person who has read the writings of Lenin, or of Stalin for that matter, must realize that communism is anti-God. In all their writings they say that religion is the greatest enemy to the communistic philosophy or political faith, and they assert over and over again that religion must be destroyed if communism is to survive; that the two cannot exist side by side. Today, I understand that in all the great country of Russia, with one-twelfth of all the people on the face of the earth living there, with one-sixth of the entire world area within its confines, there is only one Catholic priest for 160,000,000 souls, and he is attached to one of the embassies. The Greek Orthodox Church, which was the predominant church of old Russia, has in many cases been entirely uprooted, and only a few score of churches exist today throughout the confines of that country, showing that communism is relentlessly and ruthlessly uprooting all reference to and reverence for Almighty God, and taking it out of the lives of the people, and particularly of the young. The churches are plastered with bill posters. The sacred icons have been taken out and cut up into kindling wood.

That is Russia's business. We have no right to tell them how to run their country; but I have a little concern for what is going on in this world, and I have a concern—a great concern in my individual capacity—for Finland and Norway and Sweden and Denmark. I think it is no more than an act of humanity, equivalent to donating money to take care of the victims of an earthquake or a great international catastrophe, as we have done on previous occasions, to come to the rescue of Finland in a perfectly commercial and legitimate way, in line with our governmental policy, without any suggestion of intervention, and to give that country at least the moral support of the knowledge that the democracy and decency and God and freedom and liberty and humanity are not so blind as the image which we often see on posters pictures them to be. If this were a straight-out loan to Finland, I would question the wisdom of it as much as I would favor it from a humanitarian point of view.

But in the guise in which it is put in this bill—namely, only giving them credit with which to buy the products of our farms and factories, in line with our announced governmental policy, with no violation of the Neutrality Act—I think we would be recreant to our trust to the American people if we should not give to the one nation which has repaid its debt our gratitude and extend a friendly hand of credit once more when it so sorely needs it.

Mr. President, I do not know what is going to happen abroad this year; but I believe that the war will spread; I believe it will be a bitter war, costing much in life and in treasure, and I have a fear that when the war is over, with the unemployment which will result, with the factories in our own country now engaged in making munitions of war turning men out on the streets when there is no longer demand for such products, in that state of affairs bolshevism will find ripe soil in which to sow its seed. Therefore, I do not look with favor on the extension of the doctrine of communism wherever it can be held in check. If the people in Russia want it, they are welcome to have it, but in America we do not want it, and we do not want to lose any opportunity we can seize, without violating international law, to hold it in check.

This bill contemplates a loan for God and the church, if such a loan was ever made, a loan for all the freedom that has been achieved by all the struggles and on all the battlefields through all the ages. It is upholding the Declaration of Independence, it is upholding the Constitution of the United States, and the traditions of our country.

I know some Senators may feel that the best course in this emergency is to do absolutely nothing. Perhaps they are right; I shall not take issue with their conscientious scruples on this important question. For me, however, there is only one course, and that is to extend the hand of friendship to this little nation which is standing at Thermopylae and keeping back the hordes of darkness.

For these reasons, if I am present when the vote is taken, I shall record myself in favor of the bill, and if I am absent, I am unwilling to have a mere pair speak for my position upon it. The Senator from Nebraska has been kind enough to pair with me in the event he takes the opposite side on this important question.

I make this appeal to my colleagues. If Finland loses this war, that is not all there is in the scale, for no sooner will the victors march in on that country than men, women, and children will be murdered by the score, every vestige of religion will be uprooted and destroyed, and all the things which humanity loves and holds dear will disappear from another part of the face of the earth.

Who knows but that Sweden may be the next and Norway the next and Denmark the next? Who knows but that three or four of the dictator countries, including Russia, may, in the great struggle which is shaping up, join together and attempt to overcome all the democracies on the face of the earth? That may seem like a far cry right now, but Japan is already working in the Orient, Germany and France and England are at war in Europe, and Russia and Finland are also at war in Europe.

Mr. President, this is no time to temporize, when we have a perfectly proper measure before us which does not involve our Government in the slightest degree, which is in line with its traditional policy, which only extends credit to be expended in our own country, for agricultural products and manufactured goods. It is wholly constitutional, it is in line with our traditional policy, and, thank God, it is in line with the traditions and the practices which we are pleased to call the American way of life.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Was it not said in 1916 and 1917 that the money we advanced to the Allies would be spent in our own country?

Mr. TYDINGS. And largely it was spent in our own country.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly. If the day comes when Finland is out of the picture, and Germany and her tacit ally, Russia, are about to overcome France and Great Britain, I assume that all the Senator says would impel him to vote for loans to France and Great Britain.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know that I would do that. I would have to see what the circumstances were. In answer to the Senator's question, let me say that I do not want to see this country involved in war if it is humanly possible for it to keep out of war, but at the same time I am not going to be such an ostrich as to wait to the last minute until someone sneaks up on me and puts me out of existence.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is unlike the distinguished Senator who said it did not make any difference whether we abide by international law or not, because Russia could not do anything to us. I did not appreciate that argument. I think the Senator from Maryland infers that Russia can do something to us.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think Russia, in company with a possible other victor in Europe, and a possible other victor in the Far East, the three of them together, might give us something to think about; and I do not trust them 1 inch. I believe in getting ready, keeping our powder dry, staying out of war if it is humanly possible, but in the event the inevitable comes, America means more to me, as my distinguished colleague beside me says, than getting a meal and going to the movies. It means a way of life, and I, for one, would be willing to defend that way of life if I saw it in jeopardy.

Mr. GEORGE. And I share the Senator's feeling.

Mr. TYDINGS. I know the Senator does.

Mr. GEORGE. I believe in national defense, but I believe the strongest defense this Nation has ever had was a policy of neutrality strictly adhered to for more than a century.

Mr. TYDINGS. And I agree with the Senator; and this bill is not unneutral in the slightest degree. Russia has declared no war on Finland.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not asserting that it has. I simply wanted to make it perfectly plain that if the Senator is impelled to vote to make this loan to Finland because Finland is standing against Russian bolshevism will not his logic carry him to support a loan to France and Great Britain if the hour comes when they alone are standing against Russia?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I would not say that, Mr. President. That is an imponderable which no man could answer in the present state of circumstances. I further remember that in the instant case to which the Senator alludes France and Great Britain did not repay their debts to us, as the little country of Finland has done.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not controverting that. I am not even concerned about the amount of the loan. I am concerned about maintaining a neutral attitude. I believe there is more virtue in it for us, and that it will in the end mean more aid to the struggling nations on this earth, than if we do the unneutral thing; and I am concerned about that.

Mr. TYDINGS. I know the Senator is, and I know there is no better exponent of pure Americanism in this country than the distinguished Senator from Georgia.

It is my opinion that Russia is on the march. She has been on the march in Latvia; she has been on the march in Estonia; she is now on the march in Finland; she has been on the march in the Far East; she is plotting international revolution. There is before this very Congress evidence that certain American citizens have been in the pay of Russia, have traveled under false passports, have gone to meetings in Moscow, and there have said that the world revolution is coming, and that they are aiding to bring it about under Russian auspices here in our own country.

Talk about neutrality! What about these Russian activities in the United States of America? Who is unneutral there? I am not afraid, Mr. President, to refuse to cringe before that kind of unneutrality. I think this country is safe so long as there are men who will stand on this floor and fight foreign influences in the United States of America; and they have to fight them at home, and abroad, as well, within proper limits always, as provided in the bill pending before the Senate.

Russian revolution is a reality, not a theory, and it is being worked on every day. It has permeated many of the governmental establishments of the United States and many of the communities of the United States among people who do not understand what Americanism is, who do not want to understand, sometimes, what Americanism is, who are more interested in serving the wishes and the dictates of foreign rulers than they are in living in this land, the most blest of all the nations on the face of the earth.

I say the time is coming when we will have to show a stronger spine than we have been showing toward the communistic horde which is trying to weaken this Government from within. As for myself, I am ready to shoulder my share of the responsibility whenever the hour comes.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the brilliant remarks of the Senator, and with much he has said I can agree. I am satisfied that America agrees 100 percent with certain of the premises he has stated. America has no time for the communistic doctrines of Russia—in other words the Marxist doctrines—which do not include freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of worship, the right to hold individual property, the right to swap one's labor for money compensation. None of these things obtains in Russia. Those rights have been taken away by the state. But the argument of the distinguished Senator can be answered very clearly by an incident in our own history.

Way back in the days when George Washington and Jefferson and Hamilton lived—in 1798—we had just been the recipient of aid from France during the Revolutionary War. We were a free nation because France joined us in the war against England. And then, in 1798, France got mixed up with England, and then it was that the calm mind of Washington, the acute intellect of Hamilton, and other minds came into play.

That is what I am asking the Senate to do now—to think this thing through. Do not let passion or prejudice be the motivating power. Do not let us, because of our hatred of Stalin and the leaders in Russia, forget also that there are Russians who do not believe as they do. Let us think less of hating other nations and more of our responsibility to America.

Now, what is this incident? Here is the incident: France, our helper; France, who was at war with England; France, who loaned us money, and gave us Lafayette, and gave us thousands of her troops; France needed help; but here we were rising in our strength, growing, and what did we do? What did Washington and the rest of them say? This is what they said:

> With reference to the loan of money which was solicited from the United States by the French Government, in 1798, through the American envoys in Paris, the United States took the ground that such a loan would be a violation of neutrality. This is cited with approval by Chancelor Kent.

I will now cite another instance: In 1816 our commercial agent at Buenos Aires presented a memorial to the Government of the Argentine offering his services to procure a loan from the United States Government. At that time his Government was at war with one of the European governments, and when this matter came up before our Government he was instructed to stop—that this Government recognized it would violate international law if we loaned money to a combatant nation while it was at war.

Those citations are from Moore, International Law Digest, volume 7, page 978.

I also bring to the attention of the Senate the statement of Edwin Borchard, professor of law at Yale University, which is an apt reply to the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. This is what he said, and it expresses your view and mine:

> American sympathies for Finland may legitimately be expressed in private contributions to the Hoover committee or any other private donation. A governmental loan to Finland, whether through the Export-Import Bank or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, is an act of intervention and of war, exposing the United States to legitimate reprisals now or hereafter, on the part of Soviet Russia. It therefore seems to me illegal and dangerous, however tempting, to advance public funds to Finland.

Mr. President, if that is the law, and it seems to be good common sense, then I say to all America, "Dig down into your own jeans." If little Sweden can raise $15,000,000 from her 7,000,000 population, we can raise at least $30,000,000 from our 130,000,000 people. I repeat what I said before. After all, we are here as trustees, not to lose our heads, but to keep them. We are here to think this thing through. We are here not to create a precedent that will haunt us in the years to come.

Mr. President, I am not afraid of Russia. I am not afraid that Russia is coming over here. But what I say is that this Government and this people that have stood for law and order in a domestic sense and in an international sense, do not want to breach international law now.

I should like to call the attention of this body particularly to another subject which seems so fundamental, and yet in recent years we seem to have forgotten fundamentals. I contend that under our constitutional form of government the Congress has no authority to make a loan or gift to Finland now that Finland is at war. I said that constitutionally we cannot do that. The Constitution gives specific powers to the Congress.

Besides these specific powers, there are certain implied powers. If the Constitution does not confer this power to Congress, then I ask this question, particularly after the speech of the Senator from Maryland: Should we attempt to conform the Constitution to our sympathies and our emotions?

The Constitution does not give Congress power to raise revenue for the benefit of a foreign State. Congress is limited in its taxing power to laying and collecting taxes to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States—article I, section 8.

It was not until after the United States entered the World War in 1917 that loans were made to foreign governments engaged in war with the enemies of the United States. Those loans were made to aid in prosecution of a common cause under what Senator Borah called the war power. Not until the United States is prepared to sever friendly relations with the Soviet Union and join Finland in its war of self-defense may Government loans to Finland be constitutionally authorized or made by Congress or any agency of the United States.

Oh, I know that under the suggested bill we are going to camouflage, we are going to have a smoke screen; we will say, "Well, we are not going to loan money to Finland"; that the Congress has created the Export-Import Bank, and we will not loan money to Finland, but we will give some money out of the people's Treasury by collecting taxes for the purposes of the Export-Import Bank. Then we will say, "Now, Jesse Jones, if you think this is a good loan, you make the loan. But not to Finland." I enjoyed the remarks of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina today. He asked, "Why not face the thing head-on, squarely?"

Now, we are not going to lend the money to Finland. We are going to lend it to another corporation set up here. We have a principle of common sense, which is also a principle of law, that you cannot do indirectly what you cannot do directly. And yet that is what we are going to do.

Any contention to the effect that the Export-Import Bank may make loans to the belligerents, thus shielding the United States Government from committing an unneutral act in connection with the present war between Finland and Soviet Russia, is mere buncombe and mere camouflage. In connection with the Export-Import Bank it should be recalled that the purpose for which this agency was set up was "to promote and facilitate the foreign trade of the United States" and not to enable the United States by indirection to commit unneutral actions.

We here in Congress, as I said—and I repeat it—are the trustees not only of the people's money—trustees with limited powers, because the powers not given to Congress belong to the people—but we are trustees also of something else, for the things we do live after us, and the precedents we set will guide future generations. We are now about to put ourselves down as lawbreakers by indirection.

The absolute control of the moneys of the United States is, of course, in the Congress, and Congress is responsible only to the people for the exercise of this great power.

Congress is empowered to lay taxes, but the Constitution provides what for, and nowhere can it be found in the Constitution, express or implied, that the Congress can lay a tax or take the money out of the Treasury for a foreign nation to carry on war, either of offense or defense, as long as we are at peace.

By no stretch of the imagination can a loan of money to Finland resulting from a tax imposed upon the people of this country be considered within the "general welfare" power. We have gone far under new ideologies in the last

7 years to extend the power to tax, but nowhere has it been contended that Congress could in peacetime tax this Nation so another nation could go to war or defend itself against another power. A tax that is not for the common defense or general welfare, but for other objectives wholly extraneous, would be wholly indefensible upon constitutional principles. The power of taxation and appropriation extends only to matters of national as distinct from local welfare. We might as well say "as distinct from wars in other lands."

Mr. President, it is up to us to guard not only the liberties of our people, but so guard our actions here in Congress that future generations will not be hurt, will not be hamstrung.

We must realize—most of us do not—the form and nature of the Government of which we are a part. Until the people change the fundamental law of the land, Congress may dispose of the people's money only for purposes defined and designated in the fundamental law. The suggested loan of money to Finland by this Government would raise the question of the spending power as well as the taxing power. As I have said, the limitation on the power of taxation of the Federal Government is to be found in the phrase "general welfare and public purposes." It has been said that general welfare does not require any more than is required for public purposes; that taxation is reasonable when it is for a public purpose; and that for taxation to be due process of law as a matter of substance it need be levied only for a public purpose. But, I repeat, no one can say that the loan of the people's money to a foreign government when this Government is at peace and that government is at war is for a public purpose of our people.

Mr. President, it is good practice to tie to a principle. I realize that the lay mind, especially when it is swept by emotion, has little time for considering constitutional authority or the significance of international law; but if one is guided by principle, he will not let hysteria or emotionalism divert him from his course. When I hear the argument made that the refusal to make this loan might result in the spread of an unholy doctrine, I say, "What refusal?" The answer must be, "The refusal of the American people." We do not have to violate international law, breach the Constitution, or establish a new precedent or a new foreign policy to help Finland. I am for helping Finland; but I am for helping Finland the right way, the constitutional way; not in violation of international law, and not in such a way as to open the door and set a precedent which your children and mine will have to face.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. What is that way?

Mr. WILEY. I am glad the Senator asked that question. He is always very acute-minded; but apparently he was not present when I discussed the subject. I will tell him frankly. Sweden found a way. She gave Finland $15,000,000. Norway has given at least $10,000,000. France and England are giving. They are even getting ammunition across.

But does the Senator contend that any of those governments have done directly or indirectly what is asked here, which is a loan by one government to another? The answer must be "No." I shall answer the Senator's question. In this country there are 130,000,000 people. In Sweden there are fewer than 7,000,000. Sweden gave $15,000,000. If, as has been suggested, we were to give 25 cents apiece in this country as individuals or as groups or societies, we would answer the question.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand, Sweden has made no direct loan or gift to Finland as one government to another. Is that true?

Mr. WILEY. That is my understanding.

Mr. BARKLEY. Neither has Norway.

Mr. WILEY. No; nor any other government.

Mr. BARKLEY. How is Finland obtaining airplanes and other munitions of war from England and France? They are not being given by private donations. As I understand, they are being sent by the Governments of England and France. Wherein does that differ from private subscriptions by Swedish or Norwegian citizens, or even by American citizens, to some fund which will be given as a gift to Finland to aid her in her defense?

Mr. WILEY. Does the Senator want my idea of the answer to that question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. WILEY. To me it is very plain. England and France are at war. We are at peace. England and France, under the war powers of their Governments, are able to do what has been suggested. Their constitutional authority is different from ours. We in Congress are limited. England and France, through their generals and their high commands, are doing that which they think—because they are at war—is in their own self-defense. But we are at peace. There is the distinction.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator used the examples of Sweden, Norway, England, and France as the way it ought to be done.

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. England and France are not doing it the same way Norway and Sweden are doing it.

Mr. WILEY. I beg to differ with the Senator. They are following the precedent of Norway and Sweden. The people are giving.

Mr. BARKLEY. The people are giving; but also the Government is giving, or at least furnishing materials, or providing a loan, or in some way making it possible for Finland to obtain war materials from England and France.

Mr. WILEY. Does the Senator think we are in the same situation as those governments?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator justifies that course on the ground that England and France are at war. I certainly do not assume that the Senator means that we ought to go to war in order that we may do it in the same way England and France are doing it. Of course, the Senator does not mean that. How does the Senator feel we can do this in a constitutional way? If we are interested in bringing about any assistance, direct or indirect, how can we do it according to the Senator's idea of the Constitution?

Mr. WILEY. I think I have answered that question.

Mr. BARKLEY. By private donations?

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. How much has been raised in this country by private donations?

Mr. WILEY. The Senator is bringing in another phase of the subject. About $1,500,000 has been raised; but I ask the Senator whether or not he has dug down in his jeans and given anything.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a matter with which the Senator from Wisconsin need not be concerned.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator has answered the question. He has not contributed.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not advertise my private charities on the floor of the Senate for political or other reasons. Whenever I donate anything to Finland or to any other institution I think worthy of a donation, I do it in my own way and in my own time. I will not seek to advertise it on the floor of the Senate.

[Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. WILEY. Apparently what I said irked the distinguished Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; it does not irk me.

Mr. WILEY. It was not my intention to do so. My point is this: The Senator brought up the fact that only $1,500,000 has been subscribed. Why? The answer is that the people of this country still think that this Government will take governmental action. They do not want duplication. If this Government takes action and refuses to give as a government, then the people themselves will be charged with the responsibility, and will not feel that they will be duplicating gifts. That is one reason they have not "come across."

I do not believe we have a build-up of emotionalism which is not real. The American people, when they feel deeply, give.

The other day I heard the argument that we should be the good Samaritan. I turned to the individual who made the argument and said, "Do you mean that?" He said, "Yes." I said, "Was the good Samaritan an agent or employee of the Government, or did he give out of his own pocket? Did he give out of his own heart and soul, or did he take the man who was wounded to the tavern and have him looked after out of the people's money?"

The one who made the argument had to admit that the good Samaritan did it himself. I say to all America, if the people want a thrill, let them give, and they will find that they will have an elation within which amounts to something. But if American public opinion is such that it wants to require the Government or the Congress to be coerced into doing that which the Congress thinks it should not do, future generations will have to pay the price, because a precedent will be set.

The distinguished Senator was not present when I said that I already have a petition from another group in my own State asking that I agree to a bill which will be introduced, to appropriate $15,000,000 for another foreign nation, a nation which we love as much as we love Finland. I refer to the Poles. They are a great people. They have done a great job. They are fighting. They have an army in France. Perhaps we should dig into the Treasury of the United States for them. If we follow that theory where does it lead us? Up a blind alley. As suggested yesterday by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], we do not know where it leads.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not mean to criticize the amount which had been raised in this country by the committee of which Mr. Hoover, I believe, is chairman, or by any other agency. I merely asked the Senator for information as to the amount. However, I do not understand that that money is to be turned over to the Government of Finland. I understand it is very largely, if not entirely, for private relief, for the relief of those who are suffering in Finland because of the war. I do not understand that the money raised by private subscription or free donations in this country is to be used by, or will be available to, the Government of Finland as such, to buy anything which the Government of Finland, as such, needs in order to prosecute its defense.

Mr. WILEY. My understanding is that the Hoover fund is limited in scope. But there is absolutely no objection, under our Constitution, under international law, or under our foreign policy, to the great heart of America, irrespective of the Hoover fund, setting aside money which can be used definitely and concretely for airplanes, munitions, or whatever Finland needs.

I have said that I thought that in times like this it is a good thing to tie to a principle. I have said that we do not have to violate international law, or what I think is the constitutional limitation placed upon Congress.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Is the Senator acquainted with the convention of Habana of 1928?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the Senator was not present when I brought up that question.

Mr. WAGNER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WILEY. What the Senator is about to bring up is that in the Habana Convention of 1928, which was signed by 29 American nations, there is the proviso that the loaning of money in times like these is agreeable so far as the signatories to the convention are concerned.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. WILEY. In my earlier remarks I stated that that convention does not change international law except as between the signatories to that instrument.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. The Habana Convention was only an agreement among the nations of the Western Hemisphere.

Mr. WILEY. That is correct.

Mr. GEORGE. Not that they might make loans of money for all purposes, but that they might make loans for the purchase of necessities.

Mr. WAGNER. That is the point I wanted to bring out. Under the terms of that convention, while it is regarded as an unneutral act to lend money for the purchase of war materials, even to a belligerent, it is not considered an unneutral act to lend money for the purpose of buying foodstuffs and raw materials.

Mr. WILEY. If the Senator please, here is the language——

Mr. WAGNER. I have just been asked whether that convention was ratified by the Senate. I will say that it was ratified.

Mr. WILEY. Yes; but that convention provided for credits that a neutral state might supply to facilitate the sale or export of food products, and raw materials are not included in the prohibition of credits But, Mr. President, that was an agreement between 29 signatories of the Western Hemisphere.

The best illustration we have that it would not apply in this instance is the situation in the east under the Nine Power Treaty. Japan wants to cancel that treaty, and says she has the power to do so because conditions have changed; that is her reason for wanting to abrogate that treaty; but we say no; when nine powers agreed that is the law until the nine powers agree to change it.

Mr. President, under international law for 150 years, as recognized by our own Government and expressly confirmed by the two incidents I have mentioned, we cannot, during a war between two nations, loan money or extend credit to either of the combatants.

Mr. WAGNER. That is a matter of controversy. The Senator assumes that we have recognized Finland as a belligerent. We have not as yet done so. Neither Finland nor Russia has declared war. It is a factual situation which Congress may determine or the President may determine under the Neutrality Act.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator let me interrupt him there?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. WILEY. That is not a correct statement, if you please, as to international law. It is a correct statement under our embargo law, which is a domestic law, but such law cannot modify international law unless all the parties to international law agree.

Mr. WAGNER. Neither one of the countries has declared war; but both countries have asserted—one, Finland, in communications to us, and the other before the League of Nations—that they are not at war with one another.

Now if we should hold to the contrary we would have to find a factual situation which both countries deny. I say it is a matter for us to determine whether or not they are belligerents.

I inquire if the Senator has discussed the loan made by this country to Poland? I heard him mention Poland a moment or so ago, but has he discussed the loan which we made to Poland while Poland was in an undeclared war with Russia on the question of the delimitation of frontiers? In 1920 the United States, while that so-called undeclared war was in progress between the two countries, loaned Poland $24,312,000 for foodstuffs. That situation, although there are distinctions which may be made, is analogous to the present situation.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WILEY. I will yield for a question. I am somewhat in the same position the Senator was in an hour and a half ago when he was interrupted so much.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the Senator if he has read the testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee?

Mr. WILEY. I have not. I understand it has not as yet been printed for distribution.

Mr. BROWN. In that testimony Mr. Hackworth, general counsel for the State Department, in answer to a question from Senator BARKLEY stated as follows:

Senator BARKLEY. Is it the view of the State Department that under the present status of the situation between Russia and Finland the type of loan which might be made under this bill would not be in violation of international law?

Mr. HACKWORTH. Yes; I think I mentioned that.

Senator HARRISON. Do you not think it is a violation of the spirit of the law?

Mr. HACKWORTH. The spirit of international law?

Senator HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HACKWORTH. To make a loan for the purposes stated would not in my opinion be a violation of its spirit.

That is the opinion of the State Department as expressed by its general counsel.

Mr. WILEY. I thank the Senator for the information. I have already cited to the contrary the professor of law at Yale University, and the best authority in America, namely, John Bassett Moore.

Now answering the question brought up by the distinguished Senator from New York, I want to tell him what war is.

War is the contention between two or more states through their armed forces.

Are Finland and Russia contending with armed forces?

War is a fact recognized * * * by international law. For a war to be into existence, two or more states must actually have their armed forces fighting each other.

Are Finland and Russia fighting each other?

This is the definition from Oppenheimer's International Law, volume 2, pages 115 and 116:

To be a war the contention must be between states.

Is Finland a state? Is Russia a state, and is there a contention?

It is a contention of states through their armed forces.

Supra (meaning Oppenheimer), 118.

As defined by Oppenheimer in his treatise on international law:

War is the contention between two or more states through their armed forces. War is a fact recognized * * * by international law. For a war to be in existence two or more states must actually have their armed forces fighting each other (vol. 2, pp. 115–116).

The government of a neutral state is obliged to abstain from all participation in the conflict.

The extent of the duty of abstention is broad. Every possible field of activity is covered. * * * Again, the loaning of money or the extension of credit by a neutral government to a belligerent amounts to participation in the war and constitutes, therefore, unneutral conduct (Hyde, International Law, vol. 2, pp. 698–699).

I could cite a number of other authorities on international law to the same effect. We cannot camouflage the situation by saying that there is not any war over there. All we can say is that, under our Embargo Act, when we declare that there is a war, then, by virtue of that act we restrict the rights of our citizens as prescribed by that act. But under international law there is war when there is contention between two nations with armed forces in the field. That has been the rule, and is the rule. If anyone doubts that there is a war, let him go over to the Mannerheim line or let him read the newspapers tonight. Is there war in France merely because we have said there is a war? Where is there war? The answer must be, where two countries have contending forces in the field.

But, Mr. President, I will hurry on with my remarks. We are told that a loan to Finland might assure her success in her fight against Russia, and, if her success should follow, it would do away with some possible problems that we might face in case Finland should lose. If this is true, then a gift by the American people would be more effective than a gift by the Government or a loan by the Government, because it is admitted here today that a loan, if it should go through, could only be used for certain unwarlike materials. We are told if we do not make this loan to aid in stopping the war, which threatens the remaining strongholds of freedom, that we may have greater problems to face. In other words, the argument is that in making this loan we are safeguarding our vital interests of today and of the future. If the American people themselves make the loan, then, I say, fine, wonderful; that is the thing to do. But if the Congress makes the loans because of the arguments advanced, then I say we will not simply be violating a legalistic concept of neutrality but we will be violating three basic principles which are ingrained in our national life, and, furthermore, we will be opening a door that will lead us into innumerable international conflicts in which in an American sense—yes, in a Western Hemisphere sense—it is not our business to become involved. What is more important, we will have sold some of the very great values which we have inherited from our forefathers, and we will have sold them, because we permitted ourselves to go on an emotional jag. If we are so emotionally affected by the serious condition in Europe and in Finland, the American people themselves will dig down and raise the money, and I say they will. If Congress defeats this bill the people themselves will do it; and they are standing by watching. I say that the very strength of their emotions has been weakened by the false suggestion that Congress will do this thing for them. We have got too much of "Let George do it" now.

As I have already said, we have done a great deal in the last 7 years which is very close to the constitutional border line. Now we want to open it up so that other favorite groups overseas may come in and dig into the Treasury. This very instance presents an opportunity for us to recapture some of the individual independence and initiative which we possessed before we were "sold" on the idea that it is the Government's business to do everything. Our forefathers did not have such a concept, and they gave us a republican form of government under which the powers of Congress were definitely limited. When this Government was formed they knew that legislators, under pressure, were only human beings. So they said, not in exact words but by limitation, "You cannot tax the American people and take the money from the Public Treasury when this country is at peace in order to provide any foreign nation, whether the aggressor or the one attacked, with means to carry on the war." We agree that the American people have an interest in the fate of Finland, and we say the American people should "come across."

It has been stated that the attack by Russia is an attack on the rights of all peoples and that the principles of liberty and justice have been assailed, therefore it is claimed that the Government should make this loan. Mr. President, the same argument would justify a loan to Poland, to Czechoslovakia, and constantly increasing loans to China and also loans to Ethiopia, and, as suggested by the distinguished Senator from Georgia, in a few months, loans to France and to England. If tomorrow Belgium and Holland and Sweden and Norway should be attacked the same argument would justify loans by this Nation to each of those governments.

If we do that, if we keep on becoming bankers for all our international friends, we are at war. Do you not see how important it is that we tie to principles? I have discussed rather hurriedly and disjunctively today what I think those principles are.

Let the American people respond. If in the future the people of this country want to delegate to Congress the power to loan money under these conditions, then let the Constitution be amended, and let international law be changed, and let the people by their votes state that they want the well-established foreign policy of this country to be changed. Let it be clearly understood—and I repeat it again and again—that the people have the right, individually and in groups, to make gifts or loans to Finland, but they have not delegated that power to Congress.

Mr. President, I am about to conclude.

We in America are charged with keeping democracy alive. In times of great crises the Constitution was the guide of the great man whose birthday we shall soon celebrate and the other great man whose birthday we shall celebrate a week later. I refer to Washington and Lincoln. In recent years we have stretched the Constitution in relation to our domestic affairs. I pray and hope that we shall not stretch it now in relation to our foreign affairs. If only we were involved—and I mean you and I who are sitting here—perhaps we could afford to take the risk; but if we should breach the Constitution now, our action would hamstring future generations.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. The Senator has said time and again that the Constitution ought to be changed to permit us to make this loan if we desire to make it. I wonder if the Senator would be willing to point out where the Constitution needs to be or might be changed to do that.

Mr. WILEY. I believe the Senator misunderstood me. I did not say it should be changed. I said that if the people want to confer upon the Congress power to loan money to a foreign government when we are at peace and they are at war, then the Constitution should be changed to give that power to the Congress. I am not in favor of its being changed.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

Mr. MALONEY. Would the Senator be willing to point out where the Constitution would need to be changed?

Mr. WILEY. That probably would require a restatement of the speech which I made here when the Senator was not present.

Mr. MALONEY. I should like to say to the Senator that I have been present. I have been listening to the Senator's speech with very great interest.

Mr. WILEY. Then I suggest that the Senator's colleague [Mr. DANAHER] is going to take the floor after I am through. I have talked now for about an hour and a half. I have referred to the taxing power, and the right of Congress to levy a tax to raise money which would be utilized for foreign governments under such conditions as these. I also questioned the right of Congress to spend money except for the general welfare, claiming that this proposed expenditure is not in the interest of the general welfare or for a public purpose. I have referred to those two specific powers; and then I have claimed that there is contained in the Constitution no specific power from which one can get, expressly or impliedly, the right in Congress to vote money or spend money for a purpose such as this, which I say is providing a foreign government with money to carry on war, either defensively or otherwise.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, would the Senator be willing to point out to me where in this bill there is such a provision?

Mr. WILEY. I realize the position of the Senator; but the title of the bill and the remarks made on the floor today show, and every newspaper in the country knows, that this bill is but a camouflage to provide money for Finland; and that subject was discussed. I do not think the Senator was here earlier in the day. It was brought out very clearly by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] and others. Several Senators wanted to know what they were voting for, and I think several Senators definitely and clearly implied that the purpose was to provide money for Finland; and I say we cannot do indirectly what we cannot do directly.

Mr. MALONEY. If the Senator will further yield, I should like to say again that I have been present during his remarks; that I am a member of the committee which considered this bill; that I am entirely familiar with its purposes; and that I do understand that the principal purpose of the bill is to make a loan to Finland.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator does understand that?

Mr. MALONEY. I clearly understand that the principal purpose of the bill is to make a loan to Finland. I have asked the Senator, however, to clarify his statement that the bill is in violation of international law, that the Constitution needs changing to permit us to pass it, and I asked the Senator a moment ago if he would tell us wherein we are conniving to help Finland to win the war. There is no camouflage about the matter, as the Senator charges. We clearly understand what the situation is.

Mr. WILEY. If the Senator clearly understands what the situation is, then there is probably not any necessity for me to attempt to clarify it further. Let me say that the position I have taken, as the Senator knows, is that when another nation is at war, a loan to that nation directly or indirectly out of the money of this Government violates the settled principles of international law. I futher took the position that the Constitution being an instrument of delegated authority, there is no authority in the Constitution, expressly or by implication, which permits Congress to levy a tax or take money from the Treasury to give to a foreign country that is at war, even though that country is defending its own homes. That is the position I have taken.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WILEY. I do.

Mr. HATCH. I merely ask for information on the point which the Senator has just mentioned. He stated that there is no constitutional power to make a loan to a foreign country at war. In considering that question does the Senator make a distinction, depending upon whether that country is at war or at peace? Does that make some difference from the constitutional standpoint, not from the standpoint of international law?

Mr. WILEY. I make this distinction, first: It makes a great difference whether this country is at war or at peace. If this country is at war it exercises its war power, a subject which has been discussed in this body time and time again; and in the exercise of its war power it would have a right to do that which we did do in the World War—for instance, aid our Allies. But when this country is at peace, then I say that there is no such power, and I challenge anyone to point out where in the Constitution that power exists. If they cannot point out where it exists, then it does not exist, unless it exists impliedly; and if it exists impliedly we should have definite, concrete precedents to establish it, outside of the precedent that occurred during the World War and after the World War, before we declared a state of peace.

Mr. HATCH. I am afraid I did not make myself clear. The Senator from Wisconsin has said that there is no power under the Constitution for this country—I presume now, when we are at peace—to make a loan to a foreign country which is at war. My question was, Is there any power in this country, when at peace, to make a loan to a foreign country which is not at war? Is the element of war an essential element in the constitutional position which the Senator is taking?

Mr. WILEY. I know of no constitutional power that will authorize Congress to take the people's money from the Treasury to loan that money to a foreign country, even at peace.

Mr. HATCH. Whether it is at war or at peace?

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. Now the Senator has answered my question. There is no distinction whatever; and yet, as a matter of fact, has not this country made numerous loans to foreign countries throughout the years?

Mr. WILEY. I have not been able to make a great study of the matter; but I should say "No," or not until the World War. The Senator will please remember that before we got into the World War we made no loan, though pressure was brought to bear upon this Government to underwrite some loans. We refused to make loans, however.

Mr. HATCH. The time is not material. We have made loans, have we not?

Mr. WILEY. Yes; under our war power.

Mr. HATCH. We have made loans to South American countries, have we not, when no war has been involved?

Mr. WILEY. No.

Mr. HATCH. Directly or indirectly?

Mr. WILEY. No. The Senator now is getting off on the question of the Export-Import Bank. I am not questioning the power of the Export-Import Bank to do what it was brought into existence to do; but when it is proposed to use it as a means of making a camouflaged war loan, it cannot be done. I have authorities to that effect which I have cited here.

Mr. HATCH. I am not going to delay the Senator.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. HATCH. I have not quite finished. I have a little difficulty in following the Senator's constitutional argument.

Mr. WILEY. I do not blame the Senator.

Mr. HATCH. But in the light of what has transpired in this country, I shall not further detain the Senator.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. WILEY. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. MALONEY. I just want to be sure whether or not the Senator knows that the bill itself expressly provides that there shall be no loans in violation of international law.

Mr. WILEY. Yes; and I also heard the expression on the floor of the Senate today that, contrary to John Bassett Moore's opinion in the matter, and contrary to Professor Borchard, of Yale University, the State Department representative says it is O. K. I know that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a question?

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

Mr. KING. I understood the Senator to state that certain loans might be unwarranted. I was wondering if he regarded it as an illegal act for Congress to make an appropriation of $25,000,000—I think that was the amount—to acquire the Virgin Islands; whether Congress did an illegal act in making very large appropriations to pay Colombia for the alleged wrong done to Colombia in seizing, as it was claimed, what now constitutes the Panama Canal Zone. Congress evidently did not regard it as an illegal act to buy the Virgin Islands, or to make an appropriation to reimburse a sovereign state, to wit, Colombia, for having, as Colombia claimed, seized a part of her territory.

Mr. WILEY. I would answer those questions categorically "No," because I do not think those situations are analogous to the ones before us now. None of those cases arose when two nations were at war. None of them resolved itself into our making a loan to aid one of the combatants when that nation was at war.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. KING. I have, then, misinterpreted the broad ground upon which the Senator predicates his argument, namely, that there must be a specific grant in the Constitution of the United States to make legal an appropriation for any purpose other than that which is germane to the maintenance of constitutional government. It was not germane to the maintenance of constitutional government to appropriate $25,000,000 to buy the Virgin Islands, or it was not a part of our governmental function to appropriate a very large sum, $10,000,000 to reimburse Colombia because of a grievance which Colombia had against us for an alleged trespass upon her territory. There is no specific grant of authority for those payments; yet, so far as I know, no one has challenged their validity.

Mr. WILEY. The Senator is bringing up two different phases of this subject. First, the validity of an act of Congress is pretty hard to challenge as a matter of law. Secondly, he is bringing up, as I stated before, situations which are not analogous to that now being discussed.

As to the power of Congress to do those things which were done, I have not gone through the debates, and I do not know what particular constitutional question, if any, was involved. In fact, I am not familiar, except in a general way, with the incidents to which the Senator refers. To me they are not analogous to the problem here. With Colombia we righted a wrong. The Virgin Islands were for national defense.

Now, Mr. President, I am about to conclude. We in America are charged with the responsibility of keeping democracy alive. In times of great crises the Constitution was the guide to Washington and Lincoln. I pray and hope it will be our guide. If only we ourselves were involved in what we are now doing, we could afford to take the risk, but can we afford to do it when our acts will be the guide to future generations?

I know that a deep shadow seems to lie over humanity in these times, but shadows do not endure. We are informed that those who walked in darkness in other periods saw a great light. Others have seen the day break and the shadows flee away. So shall we. I interject this thought in my conclusion because in the midst of shadows men become apprehensive and irrational and lose their way. There is a light for us to follow. In religion it is the Christian concept of Deity, and in government it is the Constitution of the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7922) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes"; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia, Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma, Mr. FITZPATRICK, Mr. HOUSTON, Mr. STARNES of Alabama, Mr. WIGGLESWORTH, Mr. DIRKSEN, and Mr. CASE of South Dakota were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 4532) to make effective in the District Court of the United States for Puerto Rico rules promulgated by the Supreme Court of the United States governing pleading, practice, and procedure in the district courts of the United States, and it was signed by the Vice President.

LOANS TO FINLAND

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3069) to provide for certain loans to the Republic of Finland by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations to the amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. DANAHER obtained the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I perfect the amendment before the Senator proceeds? I suppose there may be some amendments to it.

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, after conferring with a number of Senators, and with the drafting service of the Senate, I have drawn a substitute on behalf of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the proposed substitute.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In lieu of the amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans to any one foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof which are hereafter authorized to be made and are outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $20,000,000, and such amount shall be in addition to the amount of loans heretofore authorized or made to such foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof.

Mr. PITTMAN. I offer the amendment as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the committee amendment will be so modified. The question is now on the amendment, as modified, of the Committee on Foreign Relations to the amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. DANAHER. The amendment which I yesterday sent to the desk and asked to have lie on the table had been drafted with the language appearing on page 2 of the bill. But the language of the amendment just submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations alters the existing language, and therefore my proposed amendment does not exactly apply. I therefore ask if I may see a copy of the amendment as it has just been modified.

Mr. BROWN. I am glad to give the Senator a copy I have.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, having opportunity to read the substitute just offered, I should like to alter the amendment which I yesterday had laid on the table, and in place thereof offer the following amendment, that from the language of the committee amendment as just modified we strike out the words "any one foreign country" where they appear and insert after the word "agencies" the words "of any one country."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the amendment, as modified, it is proposed to strike out the words "any one foreign country"; and after the word "agencies", where it twice occurs, to insert the words "of any one foreign country"; and after the words "made to", strike out "such foreign country and."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut to the amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations, as modified, to the amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, before we proceed further with the proposed amendment, let me ask also that the clerk take from the table the amendment which I yesterday offered, which I now will offer, and state it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the original amendment on page 2, line 17, after the word "further," it is proposed to insert the words "that no loans shall be made to any foreign government, and".

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, while I realize that we should not have two amendments pending at one time, I desire to proceed first on the amendment stated by the clerk, and direct my whole comment to the general subject, and with those thoughts, and for the convenience of discussion and for the purposes of argument only, I ask that the whole matter be treated as if it were offered at one time. It is in that particular, therefore, that I submit this language and ask that we may proceed accordingly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is not asking that the two proposals be voted on at one time?

Mr. DANAHER. Of course not, merely that we may discuss them, and it will limit the whole discussion.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator will permit me, I am not only willing but glad to enter into any arrangement which may expedite discussion and disposition of the bill. I had hoped we might dispose of it today in order that we might adjourn over until Tuesday. Last Monday we were in recess in order to give Members of the Senate on this side an opportunity to attend the meeting of the National Democratic Committee here in Washington. I understand various Republican Senators have engagements which will take them out of the city next Monday to make speeches on Lincoln's birthday anniversary. I thought it might be well to show the same courtesy to Republican Senators that we showed to ourselves, and I am still hoping we may dispose of the pending bill in time to do that, and not have a session next Monday.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the Senator whether any claim has been made that I have protracted the debate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no; I am not claiming anything of that sort. I am merely trying to help consummate what we all want to do.

Mr. DANAHER. I did not so interpret the Senator's remark. Let me, for the purpose of the RECORD, point out that when the Senator from Michigan was speaking earlier in the day he based his observations and his versions upon the testimony of Mr. Jones before the Committee on Banking and Currency. I call to the attention of the Senate the fact that Mr. Jones also appeared before the committee on the 17th of January in executive session; that no stenographic report was made of his testimony, but on the morning of the 18th the Washington Post, in an article by Mr. Robert C. Albright, a very capable and competent reporter, thoroughly experienced, reported, speaking of Mr. Jones:

> He said that he could find $25,000,000 for further credit, but said this was a congressional responsibility, and he will grant no more credit unless Congress authorizes it.

One week later the committee met again, this time with Mr. Jones present, and representatives of the State Department also present. The Associated Press, reporting the doings on January 24, said this:

> Jones informed reporters that he told the committee that if the bill passed Congress in lieu of a bill providing for a loan to Finland that he would "regard it as leaving the matter of any further loans to Finland up to the administration of the lending agencies, and I would not consider it a direction to make a loan to Finland."

I wanted those two statements to appear in the RECORD in view of the fact that so many Senators seem to think that this bill deals—as its title would imply—wholly with the proposed loan to Finland.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his request for a moment?

Mr. DANAHER. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to repeat what I said this morning, that the testimony of Mr. Jones before the Committee on Banking and Currency was not taken down. Did the statements to which the Senator from Connecticut refers appear only in the Washington Post and the Star?

Mr. DANAHER. No; they appeared in all newspapers having the Associated Press service.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think they are accurate statements of Mr. Jones' testimony before the Committee on Banking and Currency. In justice to him I feel I ought to say that.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Was that alleged to be an actual quotation of what Mr. Jones said in an interview?

Mr. DANAHER. It appears so; yes.

Mr. WAGNER. The statement was not made before the committee, but was made to the reporter, I take it.

Mr. DANAHER. I read it as such. I tried to make that clear.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not recall that testimony being given before the committee. What the Senator is now reading is a statement made by Mr. Jones to a reporter, and not made in the committee meetings.

Mr. DANAHER. That is correct. But, Mr. President, it above everything points to exactly what is involved here, and that is that once more the Congress is being asked to turn $100,000,000 over to the administration of Mr. Jones.

I say that with no disrespect or in disparagement of Mr. Jones; quite the contrary, I hold Mr. Jones in the highest esteem. But once more $100,000,000, of the American people's money is being turned over to a loan administrator to administer as he says, whether on the record or off the record, he intends to administer it, and that is precisely the point made by the Senator from North Carolina and others.

Mr. WAGNER. I may say to the Senator I know nothing about that interview, but I heard and read the testimony of Mr. Jesse Jones before the Foreign Relations Committee, and I base my judgment upon that, and not on a statement of this kind, which appears to be contradictory and at variance with his testimony. He may not have been accurately quoted in it.

I think the Senator from Michigan had the same impression I had; that it was alleged Mr. Jones made that statement before the committee. I recall no such statement having been made.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency if he will tell the Senate how it was that $10,000,000 was arranged for as a credit to the Republic of Finland, and let the Senator give us, if he will, Mr. Jones' version.

Mr. WAGNER. As to the loans that have already been made?

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. Jones told us the reason and the basis for establishing a $10,000,000 credit. Will the Senator from New York please tell the Senate how Mr. Jones arrived at the figure $10,000,000? He explained it to us.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not recall exactly. The Senator from Michigan may be able to give the exact testimony as to that. But I recall distinctly that that $10,000,000 was advanced for the purpose of purchasing agricultural and other commodities in this country, and he said that because of the past record of Finland he was sure the loan would be repaid. Before the Foreign Relations Committee he said that the people of Finland always have paid their debts, and he believed they always will pay their debts.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. In pursuance of the statement made by the able Senator from New York, I will say that it is my recollection, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that on Wednesday Mr. Jones stated that the loan of $10,000,000 that was made to Finland was not so good today as it was at the time it was made.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for his contribution. It certainly ought to illustrate one thing to the Members of the Senate, that if we are going to have important testimony in executive sessions, we should have stenographic records made of what is said, for the protection of the witnesses and as an aid to the recollection of the Senators themselves; and the very fact that the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency does not even recall what Mr. Jones told us as to how he established that, is due proof, it seems to me, of an exigency that ought to be met from now on.

Mr. WAGNER. I do not want the Senator to misquote me. The Senator says I have no recollection. It was the will of the committee that the testimony not be taken down. As I recall, Mr. Jones did say that he agreed to advance $10,000,000, and he agreed that Finland was good for a larger sum, which of course he would consider after this measure was passed by Congress.

Mr. DANAHER. How did he come to fix the amount at $10,000,000 in the first place and not $5,000,000?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator——

Mr. DANAHER. No, no, Mr. President. The Senator from Nevada was not there. The Senator from New York was. What did Mr. Jones say as to why he arrived at the figure $10,000,000 in the first place?

Mr. WAGNER. I do not know that he was discussing why there was a limitation.

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator permit me to refresh his recollection?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. DANAHER. Very well. Does the Senator recall that he told us that there was created in New York a corporation known as the Finnish-American Trading Co.?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; he discussed that.

Mr. DANAHER. Does the Senator recall that it was capitalized for a million dollars, and all its stock was owned by the Republic of Finland?

Mr. WAGNER. I recall that he said something with reference to that.

Mr. DANAHER. Very well. Does the Senator remember that he said he required the guarantee of the Republic of Finland? Does the Senator remember that?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. DANAHER. Does the Senator remember that he said he took it up with the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of State, and all of them agreed before the loan was made?

Mr. WAGNER. I do not recall that he said anything except that he took the matter up with the State Department, as he did in connection with all loans that are made to foreign governments, to be sure that there were no violations of the Neutrality Act, or that the loan was in conformity with the foreign policy of the administration. That was the only testimony I recall him giving with reference to conferring with other departments.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator. Let me say to the Senator that as we go along he is obviously recalling a good deal.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the Senator one other question. Does he not recall that Mr. Jones told us when the Finnish-American Trading Corporation was found to be capitalized for $1,000,000, and that Finland had an export trade balance of $20,000,000 in her favor, and when he found that she had cash on deposit in London and in Paris, he took all those things into account and felt that she was good—and I will quote him—"for a modest amount of credit"? Does the Senator recall that?

Mr. WAGNER. I do not recall that he said that Finland was good for a "modest amount." I distinctly recall his testimony about the past record of Finland, and he stated to us, as he stated to the Committee on Foreign Relations, that he believed the loan was good, because the people of Finland have always paid their debts, and they always will.

Mr. DANAHER. Yes; he said that.

Mr. WAGNER. And there was nothing significant about the loan being limited to $10,000,000 at this time. As I recall the testimony, he expected further negotiations for increased loans. He further told us that all of it involved the purchase of commodities from some twenty-odd States in the Nation, and that as these purchases were made the loans would be advanced.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. DANAHER. No, no; please not just now.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator from Connecticut wants to be the witness.

Mr. DANAHER. No; I prefer the testimony from the Senator from the State of New York at the moment. I will be happy to yield to my other colleagues in a moment.

I want to bring out another thing from the Senator. Mr. Jones told us that the United States Treasury took a note of $9,000,000 from the Republic of Finland some 20 years ago. He told us that the Republic of Finland had made payments of her interest regularly; that she had paid, roughly, $5,246,000 on account so far, including interest and principal.

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. DANAHER. But she still owes us eight-million-two-hundred-and-thirty-thousand-odd dollars on the original $9,000,000. Does the Senator remember that?

Mr. WAGNER. But there was no default in her payment.

Mr. DANAHER. No; no question of default.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well. Do not let us have it appear that Finland defaulted.

Mr. DANAHER. Oh, no. No, indeed.

Mr. WAGNER. And I think, also, testimony was brought out that there was a suggestion at the time the last payment was due, that Finland might defer payment because of the situation, and the Finnish Government said, "We are going to pay our debt, and we are going to make this installment payment in spite of our difficulty." I cite that to show the attitude of Finland with reference to her indebtedness.

Mr. DANAHER. One other question, and I shall conclude. Does the Senator recall that Mr. Jones, finding that there was a $1,000,000 corporation in New York, said that he felt that that would be a justifiable basis upon which to capitalize at 10 percent the amount of the credit, after taking into account all the other factors?

Mr. WAGNER. I am sorry to say that I do not recall any testimony that the Administrator was relying upon the capital stock of the particular corporation which was organized to facilitate the purchases. What he definitely told the committee, and what he persuaded the committee, was that the loans were good because of the history of Finland; and I repeat his very words. He said, "The people of Finland have always paid their debts, and I believe they always will."

The limitation of $10,000,000 was not significant at all. It was mentioned in the course of negotiations. Our understanding is that as soon as the Finns were prepared to make further purchases they would ask for the increased credit. There was no inference, such as the Senator is now trying to imply—I am sure unintentionally—that Mr. Jones conveyed the impression that Finland was good for only $10,000,000, and that that was the reason for the limitation. That was not the testimony, and I am sure the Senator could not draw that inference from the testimony.

Mr. DANAHER. Let me ask the Senator one further question in the light of his concluding observation. Does not the Senator recall that Mr. Jones said, "We will not go beyond the $10,000,000 unless you fellows tell us to"? Those were his words. Does not the Senator remember that?

Mr. WAGNER. He said he would like the view of Congress with reference thereto; but that had nothing to do with the soundness of the credits.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. No; I promised to field first to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

Mr. BARKLEY. I wanted to talk about the very question which the Senator asked the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Mr. DANAHER. I should like to yield first to the Senator from Nevada, if I may.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I wish to read the testimony on this subject before the Foreign Relations Committee. I think the wisdom of having stenographic notes of hearings is demonstrated in this instance, because the memory of even members of committees is sometimes at fault.

Mr. DANAHER. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. This is the testimony touching the subject of the first loan of $10,000,000. It is very brief:

Senator HARRISON. Was this first loan made before or after hostilities with Russia began?

Mr. JONES. Right afterward; but they had been negotiating for 2 or 3 months. The Minister first came in and wanted $60,000,000, and afterward he came back with a list of the kind of purchases that would comprise the $60,000,000. About one-half of it was for implements of war. I told him we would rule that out to begin with, that we would make no loan for guns and such. In the meantime, I undertook to acquaint myself with the ability of Finland to pay her debts, her record, her trade balances, and so forth. It took me a little while to get that information, and I reached the conclusion, and so advised my associates, that certainly the record of Finland would justify a reasonable credit. Then we said to these gentlemen, "Instead of $30,000,000 we will lend you up to $10,000,000," and when I said up to $10,000,000, I meant if that much goods were shipped, and if conditions did not warrant cancelation, they could have $10,000,000, and when that was expended they could come back and we would talk about further loans. That is the genesis of it and the consideration of it.

Senator HARRISON. How much have they received to this time?

Mr. JONES. Not a great deal. I doubt whether the bank has paid out $1,000,000. They have made commitments and purchases, but it takes quite a little while to make these purchases and get them to the ports, and get ships for them.

Senator HARRISON. They have arranged to get $10,000,000?

Mr. JONES. $10,000,000; yes.

Senator VANDENBERG. Why do you need an additional $100,000,000?

Mr. JONES. To take care of the other requirements of the bank if we are going to continue financing such exports generally throughout the country, as I have read here. Most of those are small sums, but they are helpful in that they help some small manufacturer in this country to sell something in some other country.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from Nevada.

I now yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN. I now recall the circumstance of the statement to the reporters which was made immediately after the Banking and Currency Committee adjourned. Several reporters requested that Mr. Jones and I remain, which we did. We sat around the table of the Banking and Currency Committee. I do not recall whether or not the Senator from Connecticut was present.

Mr. DANAHER. No.

Mr. BROWN. The statement which the Senator has underlined in the newspaper clipping from the Washington Post, I take it, is substantially correct. I am glad to absolve both the reporter and the Senator from any intention to misquote what was said. Mr. Jones said this, quoting from the article:

Jones informed reporters that he told the committee that if the bill passed Congress in lieu of the bill providing for a loan to Finland that he would "regard it as leaving the matter of any further loans to Finland up to the administration of the lending agency, and I would not consider it a direction to make a loan to Finland."

I have no quarrel whatever with that statement of Mr. Jones. Mr. Jones sat at the same table when I made this statement to the reporters, which he heard and to which he did not demur. The reporter said:

Although Finland was not mentioned in the legislation, Senator BROWN told reporters he thought Jesse Jones, Federal Loan Administrator—

And Mr. Jones was sitting right there—will understand that Congress wants him to make a loan to Finland if it is safe to do so.

That is also part of the record that was made immediately after the meeting.

Mr. DANAHER. The Senator would not expect Mr. Jones to demur to his statement that he would consider further loans "if it is safe to do so," would he?

Mr. BROWN. I think not; no.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. We do not want him to make loans unless it is reasonably safe to do so.

With reference to the article by Mr. Albright in the Washington Post of January 18, I take it the Senator is interested in this quotation:

He—

said he could find $25,000,000 for further credit, but this was a congressional responsibility, and he would grant no more credit unless the Congress authorizes it.

I think Mr. Jones said substantially that. The remarks which Mr. Jones and I made at that time must be taken into consideration in the interpretation of the paragraph which the Senator has read. The idea was that Mr. Jones felt that he had gone far enough with the $10,000,000 credit if we did not increase the lending power of the Export-Import Bank by the $100,000,000 which was asked.

With that statement, I say that the articles from which I have quoted are substantially correct as to what Mr. Jones and I said immediately after the meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I merely wish to emphasize what the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] has said, and what the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] has said, as to what Mr. Jones told the committee. Mr. Jones did say, as the Senator will recall and as all Senators on the committee will recall, that without further legislation he did not feel justified in holding out any hope that Finland could obtain an additional loan above the $10,000,000, or that any corporation for the benefit of exports to Finland could obtain such a loan. At that time, of course, we were discussing the specific bill which had been introduced by the Senator from Michigan.

I think it is fair to say that Mr. Jones was conferred with by members of the committee in working out a substitute bill which would make it possible, if circumstances justified it when the time came, for him to make a further loan for the purpose of exporting goods to Finland, and that he would take the language of this bill as the authority which he needed, taking into consideration the increase in the bank's capital, without which he could not make any more commitments because he was already over-committed, and taking into consideration the fact that such an increase, with the provisions which were put in the bill as amendments, would be regarded as authority on his part to make an additional loan, if when the time came, and the application were made, he felt that the circumstances justified it.

There is no great difference of opinion as to what Mr. Jones said, and what his position was then and is now. I think it is fair to say that if the bill is passed as it is now, Mr. Jones will regard it, and so administer it in attempting to carry out the will of Congress, as authorizing him to extend further credit if and when application is made and conditions justify it.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator from Kentucky. Let me say, tying all this in, that it is perfectly apparent that we have been in substantial accord all the time. So far as my interrogation of the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is concerned, let me say to the Senator from Kentucky that I have waited 20 years for this opportunity. When I first started to practice law, the Senator from New York was a justice of the Supreme Court of New York, and the situation was reversed. For the first time I have had the opportunity and pleasure this afternoon of really attempting to refresh his recollection. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator practiced before the Judge for 20 years and did not attempt to refresh his recollection, I would not say that he was negligent to his clients, but he may have been embarrassed or timid in the presence of the court. [Laughter.]

Mr. DANAHER. Let me reply to the Senator from Kentucky that as a lawyer I did my best to keep the court advised at all times. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, to come back to the general subject, I thank the Senator from Michigan for his statement after his recollection was refreshed.

With the newspaper comments established as correct, it is perfectly apparent that there is a greater intent back of this proposal than would appear simply on its face. There is much more to this situation than appears on its face.

Let me ask the senior Senator from South Carolina, as I see him sitting there, if he will recall the day last June when the junior Senator from South Carolina was here asking that we agree to a proposal to swap 500,000 bales of cotton—stagnant cotton, if you choose—from American cotton piles in return for an equal value of rubber, with the agreement, understand, that neither party was to use either the rubber or the cotton unless and until a war broke out, and meanwhile if we, for instance, took the rubber we could not sell it for 7 years, and we could not even sell it then unless we got permission of Great Britain to fix a price on it.

Mr. President, I asked the junior Senator from South Carolina if he agreed to that kind of a proposition, and he never made a greater mistake in his life than he did when he said yes, he thought that was a good deal. I do not believe that Senators who know that a million bales of cotton are lining the warehouse docks in Galveston and other points in the South now think that was a good deal.

I ask those who know about the situation that existed last September when the tobacco farmers were told that British buying would stop, unless we repealed the arms embargo now to recall, in the light of what is happening, that Britain has transferred her purchases of tobacco to Turkey because it is in her interest to do so, but not in the interest of the United States tobacco farmer. Mr. President, we now find insinuations daily in the press, editorially in the Washington newspapers within the week, and in news articles emanating from Department heads, that British credits are becoming exhausted because we have a cash-and-carry provision in our Neutrality Act; because they have to pay cash for munitions of war, their credit is being depleted. Never mind the fact that the Annalist only a year ago said that they had $9,000,000,000 of reserves in this country.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DANAHER. Gladly.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator made some reference awhile ago to some Senator last fall making a plea to have enacted the neutrality law so that we could sell tobacco somewhere. Who was that Senator?

Mr. DANAHER. I submit that I did not make any such statement, and I submit the RECORD will show that I did not. The Senator from Texas is misinformed or did not catch the drift of my comment. What I did say was that the tobacco farmers were being told by British buyers—that is what I said—that is what would happen if the arms embargo was not repealed.

Mr. CONNALLY. Was that in writing or merely by word of mouth?

Mr. DANAHER. Statements were made all through North Carolina and in the burley-tobacco-producing section generally that 200,000,000 pounds of tobacco normally sent to Great Britain would continue to go there, but today they are not going there, notwithstanding the fact that the arms embargo was repealed.

Mr. CONNALLY. The arms embargo was enacted here in the Senate and in the other House and not in North Carolina. I should like to have the Senator from North Carolina stand by and observe the history of the matter.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. DANAHER. Yes; I will yield to the Senator from North Carolina, on the invitation of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I remember a moment ago that the Senator made reference to the junior Senator from South Carolina in making mention of a certain proposed barter agreement between Great Britain and the United States. The Senator has observed that the junior Senator from South Carolina is not here this afternoon. He is detained, I understand, in a committee meeting.

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield for a moment simply that I may correct him?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. DANAHER. I did not observe that the Senator from South Carolina was absent until the Senator called my attention to it.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I understand that. His absence, however, has provided me with an opportunity to follow up what the able Senator has just said.

It is quite true, and I think the American people ought to understand it, that not only prior to the lifting of the arms embargo were the American cotton farmers and the American tobacco producers given great hope and inspiration to the effect that if the arms embargo were lifted we need not ever experience any difficulty in making disposition of all our tobacco—tobacco grown in the Commonwealth of Virginia, in the State of North Carolina, in South Carolina, and in Georgia particularly, at the regular price, but hopes were held out to the farmers in North Carolina and in her sister States to the effect that if we did lift the arms embargo Great Britain would be there to buy all that tobacco, every pound of that tobacco, at almost war prices—not 17 cents a pound, but 47 cents a pound.

I desire further, in the absence of the able junior Senator from South Carolina, to remind the Senate to the effect that so far did that influence lead in providing inspiration for the tobacco farmers of North Carolina, Virginia, South Carolina, and Georiga that $50,000,000 worth of tobacco was held at the option of the British in order that it might be available to them.

Prior to the arms embargo, it will be recalled, there were negotiations with the representatives of the British Government for the purpose of providing an opportunity of disposing of 500,000 bales of cotton that we desired to get rid of in this country on account of the tremendous surplus we had, and that was to be exchanged by barter for tin and rubber from the Malay States through the seaport of Singapore.

But after the arms embargo was repealed, our brothers across the sea said to my neighbors in North Carolina and her sister State, "We are exceedingly regretful but we find that we must be friends of our allies; we find that we must help our friends in this hour; we care nothing about our friends of yesterday; we are going to let our nationals enjoy the Turkish blend rather than that provided by the Virginia blend or the North Carolina or South Carolina or Georgia blend, and we cannot buy your tobacco. We are going to buy from our good friends, the Turks. We care nothing about what hopes may have been held out to the people in North Carolina, Virginia, South Carolina, and Georgia."

One other statement, if the Senator will permit me. All that happened after the embargo was lifted, and after the embargo was repealed it also happened that our British brethren came along and said, "We are extremely regretful that we will not be able to go through with our barter in regard to cotton. You can keep your 500,000 bales of cotton for the present, because we need all the tin we can get; we need all the rubber we can get, and you will have to wait for awhile before we will be able to go through with that barter trade." I think it may be assumed that the longer the war lasts the greater will be the need for these elements, the sinews of war, tin and rubber.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I certainly thank the distinguished Senator from North Carolina for his contribution and for the factual presentation he has so vividly and forcefully submitted.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas interjected himself into the debate awhile ago merely to observe that, so far as the neutrality law is concerned, I repudiate any insinuation that the Senate acted on the bill to repeal the arms embargo for mercenary or commercial reasons under the promise of Great Britain or any other country that we would be able to sell a few more shoes or more tobacco or cotton.

Mr. DANAHER. The point, after all, lies in this, that there is now being undertaken a brand new movement in this country to cause Americans to believe, because of the existence and the cash-and-carry provisions of the neutrality act, that British and French credits or cash in this country will be exhausted and that therefore we must take steps to repeal the cash-and-carry provisions of the Neutrality Act.

Mr. President, according to the report of the Secretary of State, only a short week ago Great Britain took out arms-export licenses in the month of December 1939, amounting to $66,840, making a total for the 12 months ending December 1939 for Great Britain of $20,991,067.72.

Whatever the situation may be so far as Great Britain is concerned, it is perfectly apparent that France, during the same period, in the month of December, took $15,035,642, making a grand total for the year of $122,120,000, or six times as much as Great Britain took.

Ah, but why should it not be so, when Admiral Stark appears before the Committee on Appropriations and tells us at this session of Congress that the United States Navy air patrols are flying 800,000 nautical miles a month, and when he tells us—and I read from page 3 of his testimony—

> Had the Germans had in mind sending any submarines to our coasts, with the possibility of perhaps getting supplies from our coasts, I think we have completely eliminated that possibility.

Admiral Stark again said:

> We took the area adjacent to our waters that we considered we could cover with aircraft supplemented by destroyers.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] pursued a most valid line of inquiry and Admiral Stark responded to his question on page 5, referring to the Columbus:

> We did not know what she was going to do. We picked her up almost as soon as she left her port in Mexico. She passed on from one set of our destroyers to another and when she went offshore our cruiser in that area followed her out.
> Senator MCKELLAR. How far was she out when she went down?
> Admiral STARK. I would say about 500 miles.
> Senator MCKELLAR. From the general shore?
> Admiral STARK. From our coast at that particular point.
> Senator RUSSELL. Have you had occasion to follow any merchant ship?
>
> Admiral STARK. I would like to discuss that off the record.
> Senator RUSSELL. Very well.

Then there was discussion off the record, as the stenographic minutes show.

Here is a situation, in other words, in which the United States of America, through its naval patrol, is acting as the eyes of the British in north Atlantic waters, where our Navy is following a German merchant ship—the ship of a country with which we are at peace—from Vera Cruz, and never letting her out of sight of one convoy after another until the moment she goes down; and when the newspaper publicity on that subject came out, it did not come from the Navy. It came from Mr. Early at the White House; and he said that the Tuscaloosa, while in the course of routine neutrality patrol, came upon the Columbus in a sinking condition, and afire from stem to stern.

Mr. President, that just was not so. The American Navy was patrolling those waters, and following that ship, and turning her over from one cruiser to another, until, 500 miles at sea, she met up with a British destroyer; and to avoid capture and perhaps subsequent internment she was scuttled and sunk.

Mr. President, somewhere or other we shall have to draw the line. Either this war over in Europe is our affair, or it is not.

On the 16th of January the President of the United States sent to this body a message. When we convened that day, I sent to the desk a concurrent resolution. Following out the very language of the Neutrality Act, I asked that Congress declare it as the sense of Congress, and that we find as a fact, that a state of war exists between the Republic of Finland and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Everybody in the world knows there is a war over there. Two hours later the President, by special messenger, sent a letter to us, after there had been introduced here that concurrent resolution which would have called for the invocation of our own neutrality act, a neutrality act which had in it language that had been inserted by his direction, giving him this very opportunity to escape enforcing what was our law up until November 4, 1939. We debated that point here. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] clearly predicted, and the RECORD will show it, that that very language would be used as an escape clause to dodge the responsibility for declaring that a state of war exists and thereupon invoking the neutrality law of our own making.

What do we find happened? We find that the President told us on September 21—and I read from his message:

> If a war in Europe had broken out prior to 1935, there would have been no difference, for example, between our exports of sheets of aluminum and airplane wings; today there is an artificial legal difference. Before 1935 there would have been no difference between the export of cotton and the export of guncotton; today there is. Before 1935 there would have been no difference between the shipment of brass tubing in pipe form and brass tubing in shell form; today there is. Before 1935 there would have been no difference between the export of a motortruck and an armored motortruck; today there is.
> Let us be factual and recognize that a belligerent nation often needs wheat and lard and cotton for the survival of its population just as much as it needs antiaircraft guns and antisubmarine depth charges. Let those who seek to retain the present embargo position be wholly consistent and seek new legislation to cut off cloth and copper and meat and wheat and a thousand other articles from all of the nations at war.

Mr. President, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] introduced into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD yesterday a statement of the hundreds of millions of dollars of American money that have been going to Russia to buy her gold. We find the situation so drastic that the Pacific is dotted with ships. You cannot get a tanker into the harbor at Vladivostok. We find that the pig tin situation is so serious that Assistant Secretary Johnson and Secretary of the Navy Edison only 2 weeks ago joined in a statement to the American people demanding that we sell no more pig tin for export, because Russia had taken so much of our domestic supply that we had less than 6 weeks' supply of pig tin in this country for our own emergency use. Senators heard the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday quote from the report of the Commissioner of Customs, Mr. Basil Harris, telling of the $80,000,000 worth of American goods that have been sent over there, consisting of copper, copper tubing, and the rest, going to supply Russia; and we see articles in the newspapers, and we listen in this place and over the air to people talking about the United States helping Finland.

Why, Mr. President, if we should declare the existence of a state of war, and if we should enforce our neutrality act—and it is our act, whether some of us like it or not; it is our law, and we ought to obey it—we would stop the business of helping Russia, for the reason that under the Neutrality Act the President has power to issue a proclamation, and in that proclamation he may enumerate all the items that he wishes to call implements of war; he may include bowie knives, krises, and machetes if he wants to, and he may stop the export to Russia of the things that are helping Russia; and he may stop the use of American dollars at $35 for an ounce of gold, doubling the amount of capital available to Russia to conduct the war.

We are financing every war on the face of the earth today, under the policy that is being pursued. What did the President tell us in his message on January 16 of this year? He told us then:

> There is at the same time undoubted opposition to the creation of precedents which might lead to large credits to nations in Europe, either belligerents or neutrals. No one desires a return to such a status. * * *
> This Government will have early occasion to consider a number of applications for loans to citizens and small countries abroad, especially in Scandinavia and South America. That raises the question for the determination of the Congress as to whether my recommendation made to the Congress some months ago, for enlarging the revolving fund in a relatively small sum, for relatively small loans, should be considered. It goes without saying that if the applications for loans can be acted upon favorably by the Congress, this matter will be kept within the realm of our neutrality laws and our neutrality policies.

Mr. President, Great Britain did not declare war on Russia when Russia rushed into Poland and decimated the country and took over three-fifths of it. Quite the contrary; Chamberlain went on the floor of Parliament and told Parliament that that did no more than restore to Russia her natural boundaries, which had been taken away from her by the Brest-Litovsk Treaty. That is what he said.

Mr. President, Poland was the ally of England. She did not declare war on Russia. The President of the United States told Congress that he wants loans, if any, to finance the purchase of agricultural surpluses and manufactured products, not including implements of war. He is financing, through the conduct of the Department of the Treasury and this mistaken, fallacious gold policy, and the refusal to find a state of war and invoke our Neutrality Act, a means of assisting Russia to conduct and maintain that very destructive fight upon Finland which has engaged the patriotic attention of so many of our Senators today.

Mr. President, I submit that if we really want to do what is our job we shall conduct ourselves in accordance with our own law; and while I recognize that there is not before this body parliamentarily at the moment the matter of a concurrent resolution to find the existence of a state of war, that is what we ought to pass, and that is what we ought to do.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Am I to understand the Senator to say that we are engaged in helping both sides by our present policy; that we are bound to see that the war continues? Are we taking part in the struggle? Short of war, are we going to help anybody who fights?

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, if we were to invoke our Neutrality Act and issue a proclamation in accordance with it, we would be able to continue help to Finland through Great Britain and through France, which already are the mediums through which supplies are, and must be, carried to Finland. There is no other way in which we can get them there. American ships cannot go there. We took American ships off the seas. Every American exporter knows that if he tries today to send cotton or anything else abroad he has to do it in a British ship, that he cannot then get a bottom unless he agrees to let the British have half the cargo, and he cannot get it then unless he pays their rates.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I understand that Norwegian ships, Swedish ships, Dutch ships, and other ships, are on the high seas, and that goods are actually going to Bergen and to other ports in the Scandinavian peninsula directly from the United States, with which the British have nothing to do. They may possibly search the ships, but I do not think they are going to stop supplies going to Scandinavia, or to Finland.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, if any shipments from this country would hurt or compete with British shipments, they are held up 12 or 15 days at some contraband control station, or at least 4 or 5 days, while the ships of some favored nation are passed through. That is what is happening to American trade. We are losing out in every possible aspect as a result of the action of the Congress.

Mr. BROWN. My point is that there are ships available to this service of transportation other than the ships of the British and French nations.

Mr. DANAHER. There cannot be many; there may be some.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. The Senator stated that the ships of some nations were held up and those of more favored nations were let through.

Mr. DANAHER. That is correct.

Mr. LUNDEEN. How about the British holding up our mail ships? We are not a favored nation with the British, then. Is that the idea?

Mr. DANAHER. I would hope they would think us so. In my heart I think of us as such. I think we are a favored nation. With me this is a favorite nation, and, so far as I am concerned, I shall continue to think so, and I want the world to think so, and I want to act for it here, and I want the Congress to continue to act for it, and when we are asked to adopt a policy turning hundreds of millions of dollars over to an Export-Import Bank, to be controlled in the discretion of an Administrator, whose attitude as to whether we will or we will not grant future credits occupied the attention of the Senate for more than 2 hours today, it is easy to see the injustice and the wrong that is being done the American people in that particular.

Why should we make loans to any country? There is not a loan in the record of the Export-Import Bank, by the way, to any country. Someone has erroneously stated that there is, but there is not. We have always made the loans to a subsidiary corporation, an American corporation, an exporting corporation, and we have taken its paper. In some instances we have demanded the guarantees of foreign governments, but we have not made any American loans to any foreign government through the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the Senator is slightly in error; I believe a small loan was made to the Republic of Cuba.

Mr. DANAHER. We bought silver bullion and coined it and sent it back to them. That is what happened.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was a loan.

Mr. DANAHER. The record will show.

Mr. BARKLEY. It was a loan, and is so included in the list.

Mr. DANAHER. Very well; then I am in error to that extent. It was paid out. There was no loss. What we did was to take the silver, coin it at our expense, and send the coin back.

Mr. BARKLEY. There have been no losses on the operations of the Export-Import Bank. On the contrary, they made a profit.

Mr. DANAHER. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. In 1939 they made a profit of nearly two and half million dollars.

Mr. DANAHER. Certainly; because loans with 5- and 6- and 8-year maturities, which no bank would take, have not yet come due; and when they do, the losses will be seen.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator cannot assume that because a loan is not due it is going to be defaulted when it comes due.

Mr. DANAHER. I did not say that. I did not say there was a loss. The Senator just said there was none, and I was explaining why there was not. The point I am making is that we ought to limit this bill, we ought to provide that there be no loans to any foreign country, we ought to provide that American money will go to help American exporters within the purview and intendment of the Export-Import Bank Act which we passed in 1928 and again in 1935, and in that way we can demand the guaranties of foreign countries on the paper, but at least we have a domestic entity with which to deal. That is the only sensible solution of the problem.

In any event, I have submitted my views, and I ask that the amendment restricting loans to foreign governments be agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BROWN. I did not hear all the colloquy, but I think the Senator from Kentucky called attention to the fact that the Senator from Connecticut was inaccurate when he stated that there were no loans made directly to foreign governments. I find that a very large loan was made directly to the Republic of Cuba.

Mr. BARKLEY. I so stated to the Senator.

Mr. BROWN. Insofar as the loan to China is concerned, the Universal Trading Corporation is a corporation whose stock, I am informed, is entirely owned by the Government of China. So far as the two largest loans we have made are concerned, they were Government loans.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, the Senator is quite correct, the Universal Trading Corporation is owned by China; but it is an American corporation. The Finnish-American Trading Co. is an American corporation. It was organized under the laws of the State of New York, even though its stock be owned by Finland. The Amtorg Trading Corporation is a Russian corporation, and, indeed, the Export-Import Bank was originally chartered to handle the Amtorg account.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator observes that in all those cases the fundamental security which the Export-Import Bank has is the guaranty of the foreign governments. In the case of China, it is not the Universal Trading Corporation, because if there had not been the guaranty of the Government of China, the loan would not have been made.

Mr. DANAHER. Has not the outstanding loan at this very time from the Export-Import Bank been negotiated in favor of and by the Finnish-American Trading Co.?

Mr. BROWN. Certainly; but the security upon which the Export-Import Bank depends is the guaranty of the Government of Finland, and they could not borrow 15 cents if it were not for that guaranty on the part of the Finnish Government; and the Finnish Government owns all the stock of the Finnish Trading Corporation.

Mr. DANAHER. There is no question about that. Is there any reason why we should not continue that arrangement?

Mr. BROWN. So far as I am concerned, it does not make any particular difference, but I think it would be just as well to cut out the camouflage and make the loan direct.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. What security have we if a government to which a loan is made becomes nonexistent? For instance, suppose in a few months from now there is no Finland. Suppose the word of China becomes worthless so far as payment of debts is concerned. We have long lists of billions of dollars we have loaned to Austria. Where is Austria today? We have loaned nearly $200,000,000 to Czechoslovakia. How are we to collect that? Perhaps we can collect some of it at the Panama Canal, or through some trade arrangement; but we will certainly have to search through the records to see how we can find a method of collecting. How are we to collect the hundreds of millions of dollars we loaned to Poland?

I think the American people had better stop and think, and that the Senate had better consider the European picture. These small nations are disappearing and consolidating into larger groups, and perhaps we may find that the securities of some nations and their promises may not prove 100-percent good. Is not that the history of our war loans?

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator from Minnesota seems to overlook the fact that while we have loaned money to other countries and have not been repaid, the money we loaned to the little Republic of Finland has been in part repaid, and they are wholly up to date in their payments according to their agreement. I, for one, feel that we are doing a service not only to ourselves, but to the peoples of the world, by recognizing integrity and honor when we find them; and the little amount of money we might lose if, unhappily, Finland should cease to be, I think would be money well spent.

Mr. McKELLAR obtained the floor.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Then, Mr. President, the Senator is in favor——

Mr. McKELLAR. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. LUNDEEN. If the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator if he desires. I have the floor.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I thank the Senator. If that is the statement of the Senator from Michigan, when are we to retire from this world-saving idea which we have been pursuing for 25 years? Whenever we find somebody in trouble, are we supposed to rush in with our millions and billions to save them?

Mr. BROWN. Not at all.

Mr. LUNDEEN. When one-third of our people are ill-housed, ill-clothed, and ill-fed here in the United States the time has come to put a stop to that sort of thing. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.] The American people are getting tired of foreign loans; our own people unemployed to the extent of ten or twelve million; without bread, without housing, and ill-clothed, transients by the hundreds of thousands in rags, living in hovels today in the coal fields of Pennsylvania and in other States. The time has come to think about America and forget Europe. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the rules of the Senate prevent demonstrations in the galleries, and I hope the Chair will remind our guests that they must observe the rules and refrain from demonstrations for or against any Senator or anything that is said in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Idaho in the chair). The occupants of the galleries will observe the rule invoked by the Senator from Kentucky, and refrain from demonstrations of any kind.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I ask the Senator to yield to me only because I am advised that during my absence from the floor there was some discussion of the barter agreement between the United States and Great Britain, and that the statement was made that there had been no deliveries of rubber under that agreement.

Merely for the RECORD, I wish to say that the fact is that rubber has been delivered upon that agreement, and it is in the warehouses of the United States Government. Of the total of 87,000 tons of rubber to be received by this Government under the agreement, one-half has been purchased by Great Britain from the rubber producers for delivery, and that amount was purchased by February 1. It would not be proper to say where that rubber is now, but it will be in the warehouses of the United States Government within a very short time.

As to the cotton, which I understood it was said had not been delivered, 167,000 bales of cotton have been shipped under that barter agreement, and further shipments were delayed only because it was deemed advisable, in the opinion of the Director of the Commodity Credit Corporation, that no further shipments be made at a time when ships were needed to deliver the cotton owned by individuals in this country, and which was sold for delivery.

As to the rubber, the reason a greater quantity of rubber has not been demanded for delivery under the agreement prior to this time, is that immediately upon the outbreak of the war the price of rubber soared, and had the United States demanded of Great Britain that it purchase rubber from the producers in order to deliver under the agreement, it would have caused hardship to the industries of this country which are dependent upon rubber to carry on their business, and to furnish employment to American workmen. Under the treaty, however, there was a provision for a delay of delivery. An agreement was arrived at. As I said, one-half of the rubber had been purchased for delivery. One hundred and sixty-seven thousand bales of the cotton have been actually shipped, and more will be shipped by June 30, the date to which the time was extended.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, and I shall not go into the intricacies of the debate between members of that committee and other Senators who are members of the Committee on Banking and Currency, both of which committees have had this measure under consideration.

I shall detain the Senate only a very few minutes, possibly not more than 3. I am very much in favor of furnishing money to Finland and furnishing it immediately. I would prefer to vote for a direct loan. I would rather do directly what is here proposed to be done indirectly. However, if this is the only method by which we can give aid to Finland, I shall vote for this method and this bill.

I want to give the reasons why I am in favor of a direct gift. We may call it a "gift" or a "loan." The two words mean the same in this connection.

Russia is not engaged in a declared war on Finland. She is merely brutally killing Finnish men, women, and children, sick and well, old and young, wherever she finds them living, destroying their homes and their property. Her action toward Finland is worse than famine in Finland, worse than pestilence, worse than earthquakes, and in these circumstances it seems to me we can make a gift or loan to the suffering people of Finland without diplomatic offense to Russia or to any other nation. The precedents are ample.

In December 1921, by act of Congress, we made a gift of $20,000,000 for purchase and distribution of corn, seed, grain, and preserved milk for the people of Russia. In January 1922 we gave $4,000,000 for medical supplies to the suffering people of Russia.

In February 1925, by an act of Congress, we gave Japan more than $6,000,000 for her earthquake sufferers.

In 1919 we gave $100,000,000 to the war sufferers of Europe.

Surely, since we gave these enormous sums to those who were suffering as a result of earthquakes in Japan, from famine in Russia, and to the war sufferers of Europe after the war, we could give a reasonable amount—any reasonable amount we desire—to aid in the protection of Finland against hordes of barbaric Russian soldiers armed to the teeth and infinitely more dangerous to human life and human happiness and to more people than earthquake or famine.

The people of the United States have always been generous toward the people of foreign nations in distress. I hope she always will be. This wholesale killing of Finnish people by the Russian armies and this wholesale destruction of Finnish property by the Russian armies is far more despicable, far more hurtful to the people, far more detestable, and far more barbaric and brutal than any visitation of Nature, and for that reason it seems to me we violate no treaty obligation and no moral obligation of any kind in making a direct gift to Finland in her present distress.

I am very sorry the committee did not report out the bill introduced by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], providing for a loan of $60,000,000 to Finland to be used as she pleases to use it. I should like to have voted for such a bill, and let her use the money not in the way we say but in the way which her necessities dictate. However, if those on the committee and the majority of this body are unwilling to pass such a bill, and are willing to pass the bill only as recommended by the Foreign Relations Committee, then I am going to vote for the bill, and thus do indirectly that which I should like to do directly.

Mr. President, I have always believed in doing a thing directly. I do not believe in roundabout ways of getting at a question or doing what seems to me it is our duty to do; and I think we would have a perfect right to act directly, and that we are under a real moral obligation to do so, for the relief of the brave people of Finland, just as we did for the famine sufferers in Russia, the earthquake sufferers in Japan, and the war sufferers on the continent of Europe.

Mr. President, I think Finland has made a wonderful record against overwhelming odds. She is entitled to the consideration and help of the world. The cowardly, dastardly, and miserable fight which Russia is making on Finland is unspeakably infamous. It ought to cause every nation on the face of the earth to break treaty relations with the present Government of Russia. I would willingly vote today to sever our treaty relations with Russia, as we did once before. Under her present leadership Russia is a death-dealing monster, trying to destroy a small and almost defenseless country. In my humble judgment, the present Government of Russia ought to be wiped off the face of the earth.

Mr. President, if we are to do Finland any good, we must act immediately. Let us pass this bill, and pass it now. Let us not postpone action on the measure. If we should do so, any action taken might be too late.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I had hoped that we might do today just what the Senator from Tennessee has indicated is his desire be done, and that is to pass the bill, but it is obvious that we cannot conclude the considerations of the bill today. I had indicated previously during the day that as a courtesy to our Republican colleagues who are going to be absent on next Monday to inflict cruel and inhuman punishment upon various audiences throughout the country by making Republican speeches, that we would extend to them the same courtesy that we extended to ourselves last Monday, by not having a session Monday. That would mean that we would have to meet tomorrow in order to try to conclude action on this bill. In order that we may not have to do that, I shall ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it recess until 12 o'clock Tuesday next, and that at an hour not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on that day, the Senate proceed to vote on the bill and all amendments thereto without further debate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I sincerely hope the agreement may be entered into. And on behalf of the Republican Members of the Senate and the Republicans throughout the country I want to express appreciation for the thoughtfulness and generosity on the part of the able leader on the Democratic side.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the request. I had hoped that I might be able to get the floor this afternoon, and if not, I hope I may get the floor the first thing Tuesday morning, because I think the question here involved is one which deserves very careful consideration. I hope that I may be able to proceed for a reasonable length of time the next day the Senate is in session. I do not think I will take over 30 minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is entirely agreeable to me, I will say to the Senator from Georgia, and I know it can be arranged.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I wish to say that it so happens that I am compelled to be out of the city on Tuesday. I have not heretofore had an opportunity to speak on this matter. Since I have not had the opportunity to speak today, I was hopeful of having the opportunity to speak on the subject tomorrow, because I had spoken to the majority leader and expected there would be a session then.

I take this occasion to say that I am anxious to support the bill, and I wish the RECORD to show that if the bill should come to a vote on Tuesday under the proposed unanimous-consent agreement I would vote for it if I were present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the past experiences of the Senate conclusively demonstrate that the kind of unanimous-consent agreement which the Senator from Kentucky has proposed does not give satisfaction. I shall not object; but we can all see, from what has been said by Senators who wish to speak next Tuesday, that the time will be completely taken up by a comparatively few Senators, and that when we reach the hour of 5 o'clock there will be many Senators who will wish to speak for not to exceed 5 or 10 minutes. The Senator will remember from the experience of the Senate that we always run into that kind of a dilemma when such an agreement is made. It seems to me he ought to change his request and fix a time in the afternoon after which speeches will be limited. I do not care what the limitation is, even if it is as little as 5 minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I appreciate the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska. This bill has been pending for some time. The House must act on it; and I think both Houses of Congress are anxious to dispose of the matter. I think the country would like to see it disposed of speedily. For that reason I wished to fix an hour on Tuesday when we might vote so as to avoid having a session tomorrow or Monday.

I will modify my request to this extent—that beginning at 3 o'clock on Tuesday, if the 5-o'clock hour for voting is retained, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes on the bill or any amendment thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to couple with my request unanimous consent to waive the rule requiring a quorum call for fixing an hour to vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION—NOMINATION PASSED OVER

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Paul Edwards to be work projects administrator for the District of Columbia, which nomination had been previously passed over.

Mr. KING. I move that the nomination be confirmed.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, yesterday I made some remarks on the nomination just read. As indicated yesterday, it is not my purpose to object to its confirmation. The information which I have obtained leads me to believe that Mr. Edwards is a very fine citizen and a very fine official. Nevertheless, he comes from a place outside the District of Columbia.

I now give notice that in the future I shall object to the confirmation of any nominee in the District of Columbia or in any State who does not come from the citizenship of that particular District or State. I may not be able to stop such nominations, but it is not fair to have carpetbagging after the days of 1865 and 1866, whether it be by the appointive power or by departmental order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator has withdrawn his objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAYBURN].

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thy mercy, O Lord, is in the heavens and Thy majesty and power reach unto the ends of the earth. Turn unto us again and give Thy presence unto Thy children, and with Thy blessing may we not fail to hallow the gifts of life. We pray that we may be just in our judgments, rich in our charity, and sincere in our interpretation of one another. Do Thou give range and vision to the thoughts that we think and to the lives that we live. We thank Thee for the happiness and the hallowed associations of our homes. The dear Lord bless them with contentment and good health. May we all enjoy life at its best that we may give this life of joy to others. Comfort the sick and all bereaved ones with the hopes and promises of our most holy faith and graciously abide with our Speaker, and Thine shall be the glory. Through Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 7922. An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE STATE DEPARTMENT

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, February 6, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] addressed the House during the consideration of the appropriation bill for the State Department and made what I feel to have been an unwarranted attack upon the State Department.

I therefore ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a letter received from the Secretary of State bearing on this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 8, 1940.

The Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. DOUGHTON: My attention has been called to the debate reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 6, with reference to H. R. 8319, making appropriations for the Departments of State, Commerce, and Justice and for the judiciary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes. I note that Representative BREWSTER, of Maine, is reported to have made the following statements (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 1095 et seq.):

"Mr. Chairman, I shall address myself for a few moments to the appropriation for the State Department and raise the question as to whether the matter I shall present, if it were typical of the practices of the State Department, would not justify refusing this Department any appropriation whatsoever. I believe the circumstances herein set out are calculated only to serve the purpose of foreign rather than domestic interests. I refer to the subject matter covered by my resolution of inquiry presented last week and answered by the Treasury Department. In the reply it was stated that the so-called Newfoundland deal was initiated on the request of the State Department. The records of the Customs Department amply bear this out.

"* * * In other words, an American fishery as now defined by our Treasury Department under the Customs Division, is a fishery in which American fishermen may not be employed. So extraordinary a result has been secured by the State Department requesting that the Treasury should revise their current regulations and introduce a so-called Treasury decision. Under the treaty of 1818 it was provided that our fishermen might land their fish on the 'uninhabited' coast of Newfoundland, 'dry and cure them,' and bring those fish back to the United States. It is a perversion of that ancient 'treaty right' under which the General Sea Foods Corporation today is going to be enabled, if the Treasury regulations initiated on the motion of our State Department shall stand, to enter our market absolutely duty free. This was accomplished by the simple addition on August 10, 1938, of the following language to the existing Treasury regulation as to what constitutes an American fishery. It formerly provided that it should be a fishery carried on under the American flag by an American vessel. Now, they add these three lines:

"'And may include a shore station operated in conjunction with such vessels by the owner or masters thereof.'"

The "resolution of inquiry" mentioned by Representative BREWSTER appears to have been House Resolution 361 submitted by him on January 17, 1940, upon which the Committee on Ways and Means submitted an adverse report, No. 1558, on February 1, 1940. Copies of House Resolution 361 and of the report No. 1558 are attached hereto and particular attention is invited to the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury under date of January 26, 1940, quoted in the report.

I have carefully examined the letter addressed to you by the Acting Secretary of the Treasury and find no grounds for the statements of Representative BREWSTER as set forth in the above extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Furthermore, an examination of the files of this Department reveals that there is no basis for the assertion or the implication that this Department has requested that "the Treasury should revise their current regulations and introduce a so-called Treasury decision."

The records of the Department show that this matter was first brought to its attention in a report from the American consul general at St. Johns, Newfoundland, dated December 3, 1937, containing information which was brought to the consul general's attention by the Newfoundland Commissioner of Natural Resources regarding the proposed establishment of the enterprise of the General Sea Foods Corporation in Newfoundland. Copies of the consul general's report were referred to the interested agencies of this Government—namely, the Treasury Department, the Department of Commerce (in which the Bureau of Fisheries was then located), and the Tariff Commission. The Treasury Department stated in subsequent communications that pending the receipt of further information from the representatives of the General Sea Foods Corporation and from this Department a decision regarding the tariff status of products resulting from the operations of the corporation was being held in abeyance.

This Department subsequently forwarded reports from the consul general at St. Johns containing additional information desired, and on August 22, 1938, was advised by the Treasury as follows:

"This Department has reached the conclusion that fish taken by American vessels owned by the General Sea Foods Co. and processed in Newfoundland under the proposed procedure described by representatives of that company will be entitled to free entry as products of an American fishery under the provisions of paragraph 1730 (a) of the Tariff Act of 1930 (U. S. C., title 19, sec. 1201, par. 1730 (a)). Article 489 of the Customs Regulations of 1937, which relates to products of American fisheries, has been amended to accord with this conclusion and the General Sea Foods Co. has been advised of the action taken."

As you know, it is the duty of Foreign Service officers to transmit information to the Department of State pertaining to matters in which our Government may be interested and when such information is received it is forwarded to other interested Government agencies for their consideration and determination as to the questions under their jurisdiction. This procedure is well recognized and is essential to the coordination of the work of the several Government departments. I am sure that you will agree with me that this Department's participation in the matter in question can in no way be construed as influencing the decision of the Treasury Department.

Referring to the statements on page 1097 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, indicating that the assignment of Mr. Leo D. Sturgeon, a Foreign Service officer, as assistant to the counselor to handle certain fishery matters of an international nature "curiously enough coincides with this Newfoundland deal" and that there seems to be "a close liaison between the State Department and Customs Department in engineering this Newfoundland deal," I may say that Mr. Sturgeon had no connection whatsoever with this case as it was disposed of prior to his present assignment which was made on July 27, 1939. Furthermore, Mr. Grady and Mr. Davies, mentioned in the debate, had no connection with this matter, their assignment to the Department having taken place subsequent to the Treasury decision in question.

In view of the nature of the statements made in the debate to which I have referred, I hope that in justice to the Department of State you will be good enough to cause this letter to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with an appropriate reference to the remarks discussed herein.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 7922) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia, Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma, Mr. FITZPATRICK, Mr. HOUSTON, Mr. STARNES of Alabama, Mr. WIGGLESWORTH, Mr. DIRKSEN, and Mr. CASE of South Dakota.

BUREAU OF WAR RISK LITIGATION

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, February 6, when this House had under consideration the three-department appropriation bill for the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce, a discussion arose concerning an item in the bill of $375,000 for the Bureau of War Risk Litigation. As a member of that committee, I promised to secure the information requested. I now ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a letter which I received from Judge Julius C. Martin, Director of the Bureau of War Risk Litigation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is that in conformity with the ruling concerning insertions at this point in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Well, these 1-minute speeches have been inserted at this point.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am not objecting to receiving this information, but I think we ought to proceed according to the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is a letter from a responsible official of the Government.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I would suggest that the gentleman ask for 1 minute and do it in the regular way.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and I will read the letter.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I suggest that the gentleman proceed for 1 minute and then insert the letter in the regular manner.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 1 minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Speaker, this is the letter addressed to me:

FEBRUARY 7, 1940.

In re appropriation for fiscal year 1941.
Hon. LOUIS C. RABAUT,
1227 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In answer to the questions raised in the discussion in the House of Representatives on February 6, 1940, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1087 et seq., in regard to the Bureau of War Risk Litigation, I have to say:

That the number of cases pending at the first of this fiscal year was 1,663. The minimum contractual liability of the Government on those contracts is $22,949,400.

In answer to the question as to whether the Government is spending money to prevent veterans from getting justice, I have to say that the money is being spent solely for the purpose of seeing that justice is done to the veterans both in getting what is due them from the Federal Treasury and in endeavoring to prevent payment to veterans whose claims are without merit, and also in strenuous efforts to bring about the earliest possible disposition of the cases.

As to the question whether or not it would be better to spend the proposed $375,000 for the benefit of the veterans rather than in the defense of their suits, I have to say that the $375,000 would possibly pay less than 30 veterans the amount claimed, and for the expenditure of $485,000 last year the Government actually saved $12,207,614.92. The expectation of saving at least $10,000,000 to the Government during the next fiscal year is the reason why an appropriation of $425,000 was asked.

In answer to the statement that no new suits can now be brought I have to say this is entirely erroneous. Two hundred and fifty-three suits were brought during the fiscal year 1939, and the law (38 U. S. C., sec. 445, as amended) provides that if the Veterans' Administration denies a claim on an insurance contract the claimant may sue the United States in the district court of his residence, and as there were 606,071 insurance contracts in force as of the 30th day of June 1939, involving a liability to the Government of $2,562,353,868, outside of those in litigation, it is reasonable to expect that many more suits will be brought. And, besides, every commissioned officer and enlisted man and nurse in the active service of the Army or Navy may now take out Government insurance, and undoubtedly many of them do take the insurance, and future suits will be brought on these contracts.

Very truly yours,

JULIUS C. MARTIN,
Director, Bureau of War Risk Litigation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address delivered by my colleague the gentleman from Ohio, Hon. THOMAS A. JENKINS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include a letter which I have written to Mr. Rose of the Country Gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

LOAN TO PUERTO RICO

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to an article in the Star of February 8, Twenty-Million Puerto Rican Loan Has Been Drafted.

TWENTY-MILLION PUERTO RICAN LOAN PLAN DRAFTED

Territories' officials said yesterday the administration was drafting legislation to create a $20,000,000 reconstruction and loan authority in Puerto Rico.

The initial $20,000,000 appropriation to be sought would provide immediate loans for the island's agriculture, industry, and commerce.

BOLÍVAR PAGÁN, Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico, discussed the proposed legislation in detail during conferences with Interior Department and Budget Bureau officials.

I want to say that a loan was made to Puerto Rico 8 or 10 years ago by this Government. The present Secretary of the Interior is now trying to collect that loan. We are paying $25,000 a year for collection and have collected about seven or eight thousand dollars a year; this has been going on for 5 or 6 years at this rate, with the exception of this last year when we collected $43,000. They are asking for an appropriation of $30,000 for this year.

The Secretary of the Interior said yesterday at our hearings he wondered whether the Puerto Ricans were ever going to try to pay it, and I am wondering if they have any intention of paying their obligations.

I think this is no more nor less than a racket by somebody who is trying to get $20,000,000 for Puerto Rico. I ask you where and from whom are you going to get the money? If they are not going to try to live up to their obligations, I think the Members of Congress ought to be very careful when we make another loan of $20,000,000 to these people. If you do make the loan, with what kind of money will they repay the loan?

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, on day before yesterday Butler University, at Indianapolis, Ind., celebrated its ninetieth anniversary. Fourteen college presidents were amongst the guests. At that time Butler University conferred a signal honor upon a Member of this House, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW]. [Applause.]

By giving to him the degree of doctor of laws it at the same time, in my opinion, conferred an honor upon itself, because the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] is not only an able and distinguished writer, but he is a sound-minded, courageous, and conscientious Representative in this body. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the very gracious remarks of the gentleman from New York about our esteemed colleague the gentleman from Indiana,

LOUIS LUDLOW, and I wish to concur heartily in his estimate of this very distinguished gentleman.

The gentleman from Indiana, LOUIS LUDLOW, by his long experience in Washington as a newspaperman preceding his experience in the House of Representatives has had a perspective of the legislative situation that is not enjoyed by many of us Members of Congress. I know of no Member of the House, and certainly no member of our Appropriations Committee, who is more diligent, more conscientious, and more sincere in his efforts to serve his district and the country than the gentleman from Indiana, LOUIS LUDLOW. I did not know that he was present, but I see he is here, blushing in his accustomed modesty.

I believe this university has honored itself as well as having honored the gentleman from Indiana, LOUIS LUDLOW, in conferring this degree upon him, and I am sure the Members of the House will appreciate the honor that has also been conferred upon this body. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully ask the indulgence of the House to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, the very beautiful encomiums which my friends have paid to me here today are as much a surprise as was the conferring of this degree. When word came that Butler University had chosen me to receive the honorary degree of doctor of laws, I said to my helpmate that I thought it was a case of mistaken identity—that I could not imagine I had ever done anything to deserve such an honor.

There are times when the tongue cannot, just simply cannot, speak the language of the heart, and that is the fix I am in at this moment. My faltering tongue does not permit me to give expression to the deep appreciation that is in my heart for the kind tributes of these two great men with whom I have had the honor of being associated in committee work and in the daily proceedings of the House. To them and to the many others who have encouraged me with their warm handclasps today I can only say, simply and sincerely and truly, I thank you. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on two subjects:

First. To insert in the Appendix of the RECORD Westbrook Pegler's article in the Washington Post of February 8.

Second. To insert a letter from Joseph Cadden, executive secretary of the American Youth Congress, to John Hamilton, chairman of the Republican National Committee, under date of February 6.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the Augusta Times Dispatch dealing with the farm-tenant problem.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a resolution which I have received from the board of supervisors of the North Crowley Ridge soil-conservation district in Clay and Greene Counties, Ark.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

DELEGATION OF CERTAIN FUNCTIONS BY SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1955) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to delegate certain regulatory functions, and to create the position of Second Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, further insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain this bill?

Mr. JONES of Texas. This was originally a Senate bill which authorized the Secretary of Agriculture, in assigning duties to various officers, to designate someone above a certain rank to conduct hearings. It is physically impossible for all the hearings to be conducted by the Secretary. The Senate bill not only provides for that, but it created an additional office. The House refused to create the additional office.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Has this bill been before the gentleman's committee?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; this was before my committee; and as the Senate bill was amended, it was reported favorably. Our committee struck out all of the Senate bill and substituted its own.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Has the gentleman from Kansas been consulted about the matter?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; I talked to the gentleman from Kansas about it, but I did not say that I was going to call the bill up today. I may say that the bill originally passed the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman from Kansas know that the bill was to be called up today?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I did not tell him it would be called up today. I talked the matter over with him, however, and he seemed to have on objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. In view of the fact that the gentleman from Kansas is not here, I hope the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his request.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Certainly, I will withdraw it, for I have not the slightest desire or intention of taking advantage of anyone. My only reason for calling it up was to dispose of it. As I say, I had talked to the gentleman from Kansas, and he did not express any objection.

THE AMERICAN YOUTH CONGRESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the American Youth Congress, which is holding its meetings here in Washington, has, through several of its affiliated organizations, attacked the National Youth Administration and Aubrey Williams for his order directing that, wherever requested, lists of project workers were to be made available to Army recruiting officers, so that information could be sent to the youth concerning enlistment in the Army.

When I read in the press of the protests made by some of the affiliated organizations of the American Youth Congress, I made a request for a copy of the protests and of the reply or replies sent thereto, which I have received.

I feel it a privilege to insert in the RECORD Mr. Williams' reply, in which he takes sharp issue with the American Youth Congress in this matter and declares that youth on projects of the National Youth Administration have the same right as all other citizens to have information concerning enlistment in the Army as well as information concerning the work and activities within the Army.

I want to commend Aubrey Williams for the stand that he has taken in this matter, and commend the National Youth Administration again for the fine work that it is doing for American youth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include certain letters and telegrams.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK]?

There was no objection.

The letters and telegrams referred to follow:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 5, 1940.

MR. AUBREY WILLIAMS,
National Youth Administration, Washington, D. C.:

Strongly protest action your office turning over list N. Y. A. workers to Army recruiting service. This gross violation of purpose of National Youth Administration. We propose Congress expand N. Y. A. program by appropriation of $250,000,000 to provide jobs at decent wages and end all effort to subordinate N. Y. A. to war preparation. We want to work for humanity with our education, not destroy it by bullet and bayonet.

AMERICAN YOUTH CONGRESS JOBS COMMISSION.

FEBRUARY 8, 1940.

Jobs Commission, American Youth Congress, 8 West Fortieth Street, New York, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN: I am in receipt of your telegram protesting the National Youth Administration's making available to the Army lists of its project workers.

I find it very difficult to agree with your position in this, as I think every citizen in the Nation has a right to have information with respect to enlistment in its armed forces, and I see no good reason why the project workers of the National Youth Administration should not have this information along with all the other young people in the country. In addition to their right to have this information, there is the factor of occupational opportunities available within the Army that they have a right to know about.

I can see no possible harm to any young person in the receiving of this information, for he is still a free agent under our democratic form of government to choose what career he will follow, and there is not the slightest coercion, either implicit or explicit, in our furnishing such lists to the Army.

Sincerely yours,

AUBREY WILLIAMS,
Administrator.

One thousand delegates representing youth organizations meeting in New York City on Saturday, February 3, unanimously condemn use of N. Y. A. lists by Army, and oppose all steps toward increasing Army control over C. C. C. or recruiting through N. Y. A. rolls.

THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT PAY ROLL

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I think it was Thomas Jefferson who said that the Government that governs least governs best. The most important item in today's newspaper is a story headed "United States Pay Roll Hits 987,500—An All-Time High." In the story there is this paragraph:

> The records also show that the pay roll has forged steadily ahead under the reorganization plan which was advanced in the interest of economy. It has added 101,772 employees to the pay roll.

With all of the conversation we have had on the floor of the House and elsewhere regarding the accomplishments of the New Deal, may I say that after 7 years of New Deal experimentation, we find our Federal pay roll up to almost a million employees. The New Deal refuses to compromise. America's voters must write the compromise of 1940 for them.

For 7 years the Democratic Party has held complete control of the legislative and executive policies of the Nation. During these years, our national administration has undertaken to control more activities of the people of this country than any other government in the previous history of our land. Regulation has become the rule rather than the exception in dozens of industries. A conception of interstate activity has risen in Washington which makes virtually every major undertaking in the Nation part and parcel of a Federal program. The business of America has come more and more to be regarded as the direct concern of official Washington. Bureaus designed to delve into the operations of every factory, shop, store, have been established at the expense of the taxpayer.

Vast expenditures have been demanded by the Democratic chieftains in the name of the New Deal. Gigantic projects have been conceived to furnish labor with opportunities to work. Agriculture has been subsidized as never before in the history of our Nation. Pressure groups of every description have seized the moment to assert their claims upon the purse of the country. And yet, despite the greatest steady outpouring of funds in the history of mankind during times of peace, the problems which we have sought to meet remain completely unsolved. The New Deal has sought the advice and counsel of thousands of economic experts. It has conscripted men to pit their brains against the heart-chilling depression in which we have floundered for 6 years, to no avail.

The unemployed 10,000,000 who were with us in 1933 are with us still. Worse than this, there is nothing whatever in the minds of the New Dealers today which offers us any hope that this condition will change. Like dried-up fruit, the "brain trust" has squeezed its collective intelligence completely dry, and there is neither juice nor life remaining. It is fit only to be cast aside, reduced to pulp, and abandoned.

There are none, even now, who can deny the fundamental soundness of our national economy. We are the greatest producers of goods in the world today. Our people live more comfortably than those of any other land on the surface of the globe. Our destiny, no matter how poorly our leaders may administer it from time to time, is linked ineradicably with the iron in our hills, the coal in our mines, the oil in our earth. Abundance is here for us to take. The New Deal has merely forgotten the simple elements of physical engineering.

To bring us the riches lying within our great soil men must have reason to desire them. They must know that for their efforts they are to be rewarded. They must believe that the more they work, the harder they labor, the more they plan, the greater will be the fruits of their toil. Remove from them this incentive to struggle, crush their hopes, and they cease to battle. Let them suspect for one moment that the longer they work the more they will be compelled to give up to others and the greatest treasure in the world might lie beneath their feet untouched.

Here is the basic fallacy of the New Deal. They have remembered America's tremendous natural resources, her potential wealth, but they have forgotten the nature of human beings. They have failed to remember that men are finite, interested in helping others, of course, but primarily concerned with reaping the wheat they have sown for themselves. To call upon the farmer to plant his crop, to protect it, to harvest it, and then to give it up is to ignore human nature.

Here in America we have boasted, "To each according to his due." When we refuse to heed this unchangeable maxim we achieve nothing.

Unemployment continues in our Nation unchecked, because the Democratic Party refuses to stimulate employment. A doctor summoned to treat a sick man would not remain in the confidence of his patient for 6 years if the patient had remained in bed every day of the treatment. Yet the national physicians of the Democratic Party have been prescribing medicines almost daily for the ailing Nation, and we are still prostrate upon our couches. The desperate condition in which we find ourselves needs little description.

With conditions improving, the National Industrial Conference Board tells us that we are even today only one-third better off in terms of unemployment than we were at the bottom of the depression. There are still over 10,000,000 men and women completely unemployed, according to the statistics compiled by the Board.

What is there for us to do about it? Prophecy is always hazardous; yet it must be attempted if ever we are to rise from the rut in which we are floundering.

The Republican proposals are simple. We urge the Nation to alter its present course. We ask our people to change doctors, to try a new treatment which can surely be no more disastrous in its results than the one from which we are now suffering. The philosophy of the New Deal is based upon a belief in a strongly centralized government. We ask the abandonment of that theory. The New Deal conceives its task to be the organization of our economic life upon a blue print of prescribed activities rigidly controlled by Executive supervision. We urge the reinstatement of those conditions under which private initiative built America to its greatest peaks.

Here in our United States 1 man of every 13 is out of work. In England, when things were darkest in 1932, only 1 man out of every 16 could find no employment. In Germany, one of the factors contributing to the rise of Nazi supremacy was the unemployment of 1 man in every 11. Our proportions are almost as bad today. We shall not willingly permit these conditions to give rise to dictatorship, but they must give rise to an earnest and speedy effort to correct them.

The issue in America is simple. Our Democratic leaders came to the people of this country promising gifts. They promised to achieve a rebirth of prosperity. They have been tried and found wanting.

We know that we must change our leadership if there is to be a change in our policies. The Republican Party is pledged to accomplish no miracles. We can offer no panacea for the many ills in which we find ourselves. Yet we are convinced that under our direction the chronic unemployment of 10,000,000 men and women, which constitutes a menace to our economic, social, and political health will be checked.

A sober program which will restore business confidence in the outlook for the future, a soundly rooted sense of the complete interdependence of labor and capital, are the stock in trade of the Republican Party today. Millions of American citizens are coming daily to the conclusion that these tools must become the stock in trade of our entire Nation tomorrow.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANDOLPH asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

STATEMENT OF MRS. ROOSEVELT

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago Mrs. Roosevelt invited a number of United States Senators and Representatives to the White House to meet a delegation representing the American Youth Congress for the purpose of ascertaining the policies of that organization.

Mrs. Roosevelt has been unjustly criticized because of a statement she is alleged to have made regarding a number of young Communists who belong to the American Youth Congress. I was one of the men who was present at the conference. I did not hear Mrs. Roosevelt say that she believed in communism—in fact, she said the opposite. Other Members will verify this fact. She made the statement that youths should have the right to express their opinions regarding the program in which they are interested.

It is my belief that the Communists, Socialists, Nazis, Fascists, and the people of all political parties and religious beliefs should have the right of expressing their opinions. To deny a person the right of freedom of speech is very undemocratic. I believe it is dangerous to our Government to prevent freedom of speech.

Mrs. Roosevelt is deserving of a great deal of commendation because of her broad-minded, progressive, and humanitarian views. [Applause.]

MEETING OF A SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COMMITTEE

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next a special subcommittee of the District of Columbia Committee may be permitted to sit during the session of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER]?

There was no objection.

YORK COUNTY AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION ASSOCIATION

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the farm extension association of my county, York County, Pa., held its annual meeting. Everywhere throughout the meeting it was evident that the farmers in my county are interested in larger yields, heavier dairy production, and better farming, which is contrary to the curtailed production advocated by the Department of Agriculture.

It was also stated that the 7,000 farms in my county last year had an income of $11,000,000, and $5,250,000 of this came to the dairy farmers.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I asked for this time merely to ascertain, if I can, the program for next week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Monday will be District Day, of course.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will any business other than that in order on District Day be transacted on Monday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No. On Tuesday we expect to begin general debate on the naval appropriation bill, and probably general debate on that bill will continue on Wednesday after one committee has been called on the calendar. It is the hope that we will complete the consideration of that bill during the week.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It is not expected that any other legislation will be considered next week except that?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. None is contemplated at the present time.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE] may be granted leave of absence for today on account of official business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a brief statement of the loyal services of Sam Hardy, who today has completed 32 years of service as an employee of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to follows:

SAM HARDY, AN ABLE AND EFFICIENT EMPLOYEE

Mr. Sam Hardy, the courteous, able, and efficient messenger to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, completes 32 years of service to that committee on February 9, 1940. During this period he has served under the following eight chairman: Hon. Serena E. Payne, of New York; Hon. Oscar W. Underwood, of Alabama; Hon. Claude Kitchin, of North Carolina; Hon. Joseph W. Fordney, of Michigan; Hon. William R. Green, of Iowa; Hon. James W. Collier, of Mississippi; Hon. Willis C. Hawley, of Oregon; Hon. Robert L. Doughton, of North Carolina.

Sam's exceptional knowledge of the public documents relating to matters within the jurisdiction of that committee makes his services to the committee almost invaluable.

In his 32 years of service he has made his work unique. It is the general opinion that he is principally responsible for the Ways and Means Committee having the finest set of records and documents of any committee at the Capitol, neatly and orderly kept, accumulated over a number of years. He is thoroughly familiar with this storehouse of material, as the office of the legislative counsel, Members of Congress, and the staffs for which he works unanimously will testify. They further testify that, no matter what the pressure of his immediate task, he is unfailingly courteous and prompt when called upon. By his work he saves an incalculable amount of time for members of the staffs and others, as well as the public.

Mr. FLAHERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial in the Boston Evening Transcript advocating the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the legislative program today I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

EXTENDING THE CLASSIFIED EXECUTIVE CIVIL SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 960) extending the classified executive civil service of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 960, with Mr. MCLAUGHLIN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill had two titles. Title I deals with the extension of the civil-service law and title II deals with the extension of the Classification Act to employees outside of the District of Columbia, or what we generally call the field service. I do not think there is any controversy about title II. The only thing it does is to give permission to the President to extend the Salary Classification Act to our employees back in our home States who at the present time are not covered by that law, although some of them are paid in accordance with that law. I cannot see any reason myself why the employees outside of Washington should not have the benefit of that act just as those in the departmental service here in Washington do. So I am going to confine my remarks primarily to title I of the act, which undertakes to do only one thing, and that is to restore to the President the general authority he would have under the Civil Service Act of 1883 to bring into the classified service excepted positions by Executive order, provided the employees occupying those positions now qualify in a noncompetitive examination.

I call your attention to the report filed by the committee on this bill, in which we set out a historical record of the action of each President of the United States since 1883 as to bringing employees under the classified civil service by Executive order. You will find there that every President has exercised this authority, and that in every case, except that of the Coolidge administration, where a small group in the Prohibition Enforcement Unit was brought in by competitive examination, every other President except Franklin D. Roosevelt has brought them in by Executive order without any examination whatsoever.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I am sorry I cannot yield at this time.

We will hear a lot of pious talk over on the left here about competitive examinations. The Republican national convention of 4 years ago and the Democratic convention of 4 years ago pledged the two major parties to an extension of the civil service. This bill carries out the pledge of both parties. It carries out the request of the President of the United States, made repeatedly to this Congress, that he be given authority to extend the classified service upward, outward, and downward to include all positions except those of a policy-determining nature; and that is what this bill would give him the authority to do. It includes not only the newer agencies, but it also includes many employees of the older agencies, some of whom have been in the employ of the Government for as long as 20 years, such as deputy collectors of internal revenue and other employees of that type.

Now, I shall not have the time during this general debate to read excerpts from the testimony delivered before this committee, but the hearings are available here to any Member of Congress who wishes to read them, and they show that the Civil Service Commission itself, and various organizations of labor and of public citizens interested in the welfare of the Federal Government, all testified that this bill was the only practical way in which these present employees' positions could be brought under the classified civil service.

There is one witness' testimony that I want to refer to briefly. Mr. H. Elliot Kaplan, the executive director of the National Civil Service Reform League, who for more than 25 years has been engaged solely in the promotion of civil service, with headquarters in the city of New York, testified that it was his opinion—and you will find it on page 94 of the hearings—that this bill provided the only practical method of bringing these positions under the classified service.

He testified that it was the history of civil service under all parties and in all jurisdictions that extensions had been made by classifying employees already on the job, generally without any examination whatever, but this measure provides for a noncompetitive examination, which, as I stated on yesterday, in its contents is the same as a competitive examination.

I also call your attention to the fact that a representative of the National League of Women Voters, Mrs. Louisa G. Baldwin, its first president, made practically the same statement in support of this bill. That organization is in support of the measure.

I also call your attention to the fact that a representative of the Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Miss Mary T. Denman, testified practically to the same effect.

I mention these three organizations because they represent people who have no interest in this except the interest of the public and of the general welfare.

In addition to this, Mr. Fred B. Linton, the Washington representative of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce, testified in support of this bill, representing that fine group of young men throughout the country whose ages are between 21 and 35, in 550 local communities having a membership of over 100,000.

This bill has the endorsement of the American Federation of Labor and of every one of its constituent bodies. It also has the endorsement of every organization of Federal employees, both affiliated and nonaffiliated, and of the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

In addition to this, I want to refer to the fact that I have a letter here which I shall put in the RECORD from Mr. Leo E. George, president of the National Association of Post Office Clerks, which I refer to specifically because you will find in the hearings a few communications from locals of the organization opposing this bill; but the organization as a whole has endorsed it, and is wholeheartedly supporting H. R. 960.

I also have in my hand a letter from the Secretary of the Navy which I want to read to you.

In effect this letter says that the Navy Department has found the services of the Civil Service Commission to be satisfactory, especially so during the present period of great expansion of the force of the Navy Department.

I have in my hand a letter from the American Association of University Women, the National Federation of Women's Clubs, and the National League of Women Voters, the National Women's Trade Union League, addressed to Congress on the date of February 7, 1940, in which they endorse the bill.

I have a letter from J. M. Carmody, Administrator of the Federal Works Administration, calling attention to the fact that he asked the Appropriations Committee just this session to extend the civil service to all employees in his agency, and since that committee declined to do so, he has written me asking that legislation be enacted for that purpose.

I have a letter dated January 23, 1940, from Leonard D. White, former Republican member of the Civil Service Commission, advocating the passage of H. R. 960, which I shall put into the RECORD.

I have a letter from James B. Burns, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, advocating the passage of this bill.

I refer to the fact that the Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, on January 14, 1937, made a speech at the Town Hall meeting in New York City, with reference to the civil service, in which he stated his conviction that the Civil Service Commission and the civil-service law are the proper methods of employing persons in the public service. He also makes a very significant statement with reference to his operations in employing persons outside of the civil service, as provided by Congress under the P. W. A., and states that in effect he set up a "little civil service" commission in his own office and followed the procedure and technique of the Civil Service Commission, even going to the extent of borrowing from the Civil Service Commission some of its experts to aid him in setting up that office, which indicates a duplication of efforts and expense, where we leave employees outside of the civil service.

There is a statement in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 90, made by Mr. Burlew, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, which you will find on page 232 of the RECORD of that date, in which he outlines the procedure used in that Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes. I call attention to the fact that the National Civil Service Reform League, at the present time headed by Mr. Samuel H. Ordway, another former Republican member of the Civil Service Commission, is actively engaged in a campaign to secure support for H. R. 960, advocating its adoption with the noncompetitive examination, which, they say, is the only practical method of bringing these employees under the civil service.

I point out to you that in the debates yesterday reference was made to some criticism of the Civil Service Commission by J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. I have not the time to read it, but I have in my possession a statement by the Commission giving the facts with reference to that controversy, and I have a letter here in my possession from Mr. Hoover himself outlining his objections and the answer of the Commission in detail, which I shall be very glad to show to any person interested enough to read it. The facts are that Mr. Hoover does not believe in civil service, and we are not attempting, at least I am not personally attempting, to bring in the agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Mr. Hoover made an agreement with the Commission that he would do the investigating of persons tentatively certified to him, and the record shows that of some 700 persons to whom he objected, the Commission sustained his objections in 500 cases, even though he would not disclose to the Commission the results of his investigation. So I say that his statement is made in bad faith and does not reveal the facts.

I also have in my possession a letter from the Commission with reference to the post-office examination referred to by our colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOSER] and the facts are that that certification has been held up pending further investigation, but the facts reveal that the person to whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOSER] objected was a member of an organization which had been criticized by some persons and which has been designated by some as being a communistic front organization.

The investigation made first by the Commission showed great support for this applicant by the citizens of the city in which the post office was located, and the Commission said that they are not in a position, with the present evidence, to disqualify her simply because she belonged to an organization which in itself was not criticized as being communistic, but has been referred to by some persons as being a part of the united front, which is being criticized. The Commission said in its letter that they do not like to see anybody in the Government service who could be criticized as having radical tendencies, but that they must follow the law, that the duty rests on Congress to write the law, and if we fail to say by law that a person who belongs to an organization charged with being communistic cannot be employed in the Government service, then Congress ought to exercise its prerogative and make such a law to guide the Commission.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. COX. Would the gentleman object to writing into the act a provision that no one who embraces a communistic doctrine or who has been associated with that organization shall be eligible to be covered into the civil service?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not think that question ought to be injected into this bill, I may say to my colleague from Georgia, but I do think that Congress has the duty of passing on the eligibility of people who work for the Government, and legislation ought to be brought in if we are to circumscribe the present language of the act.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. COX. Of course, I think all of us concede that the bill covers into the civil service the type of worker that ought never to have been in the employ of the Federal Government. Would the gentleman object to writing into the act a proviso that it shall not take effect until the Civil Service Commission shall have complied fully with the quota provision of the original act?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Well, I cannot agree to an amendment of that sort. An amendment will be offered with reference to the quota system which I may be in a position to agree to, but I do not think we should go to the extent the gentleman suggests, of withholding application of the law until that was done. That would disrupt the services of the Government if we undertook to immediately bring about equalization under the quota system.

Mr. COX. Should there not be compliance with the quota provision?

Mr. RAMSPECK. There is compliance with the quota provision. The reason the quota is out of balance is due to conditions which arose during the World War, but the quota law does not apply to dismissals from service.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. DUNCAN. Is there anything in this bill that would permit the Civil Service Commission to write regulations as to basic requirements—say, educational requirements—that would eliminate many persons who have been in the service for a great many years and otherwise qualified?

Mr. RAMSPECK. There is nothing in this bill that changes their present power along that line.

Mr. DUNCAN. Does not the gentleman think that those who have rendered service should be permitted to take the examination?

Mr. RAMSPECK. They will be. This bill does give that right to all employees in the agencies to be covered to come under the law.

Under authority given to extend my remarks, I include herewith brief extracts from the testimony of H. Elliot Kaplan, executive director of the National Civil Service Reform League; Mrs. Louisa G. Baldwin, first vice president of the National League of Women Voters; Miss Mary T. Denman, national legislative chairman of the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, Inc.; and Fred B. Leonard, Washington representative of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce.

Excerpt from testimony of H. Elliot Kaplan, executive director, National Civil Service Reform League:

The CHAIRMAN. I personally do not know anybody who has had more experience and given more study to the question of the merit system over a period of at least 25 years than you have. In your judgment, is it practically possible to bring these positions under the civil-service system in any other way than the one proposed by this bill, taking into consideration the political as well as other factors?

Mr. KAPLAN. I am looking at this from a realistic and an idealistic standpoint. Undoubtedly, if you gave the Civil Service Commission a few years within which to do the job and millions with which to hold these examinations, and make them as practical and as real as possible, in order to determine actual ability and potential capacity to perform the work, and if you could get the political organizations on both sides to agree to it, I would say that open competitive examinations would be the ideal way to handle this matter. I have lost my long hair of reform long ago, and I try to view this problem of civil-service reform and extension practically. The history of civil-service reform and extension and the history of the extension of the classified service from exempted to competitive positions, whether in the Federal Government, city government, or State government, has been made almost exclusively by our having to sacrifice the ideal of open competitive examination in order to get an extension of the civil-service going. We have more or less accepted that principle realistically for the reason that if we did not the political party in power, generally having control over the appointees at the time, was utterly reluctant to sweep the incumbents out of office; and unless they could cover them in by qualifying examinations or no examinations at all, we have not gotten anywhere in an effort to extend the civil-service principles.

The only instance in the Federal service that I can recall where the Congress has required open competitive examinations for positions that have been filled by incumbents was in connection with the Prohibition Unit. The reason for that was that the National Civil Service Reform League and others had published a study of the appointees of the Prohibition Unit, which report showed conditions to be so scandalous that even the Congress itself could not see fit to cover in the incumbents; and as a means of meeting public clamor and demand for a sweeping change, and in order to bolster confidence in the integrity of the Prohibition Unit, the Congress itself required that all positions in the Prohibition Unit must be filled by open competitive examinations. That is the only instance I recall.

Later Mr. Kaplan said:

Mr. KAPLAN. After all, as we view this whole problem, we believe that the matter of extending the competitive service for the future is more important than whether these persons come in this or that way.

Statement of Mrs. Louisa G. Baldwin:

We should like to comment on the method proposed for giving civil-service status to incumbents of positions brought into the classified service for the first time. In our opinion the giving of civil-service status after the passing of a noncompetitive examination given by the Civil Service Commission and on the recommendation of the head of the agency in which the individual is employed is the best method of meeting this problem.

Noncompetitive examinations conducted by the Civil Service Commission are adequate to determine whether incumbents of such positions have the necessary qualifications to keep the positions they hold. Furthermore, the giving of noncompetitive examinations is a less cumbersome and less expensive process than the giving of open competitive examinations. When new agencies are established and new positions created, we believe that such positions should be filled through open competitive examinations. When agencies are already operating, however, the giving of noncompetitive examinations to incumbents of positions brought within the classified service seems the most satisfactory method of transferring personnel to the classified civil service.

Statement of Mary T. Denman:

As for the achievement of classified status by present incumbents of positions, the bill's provisions seem to us to offer the only practicable way of dealing with so large a number of employees without considerable disruption of the services affected. We are aware that open competitive examinations offer a proper method for the selection of public personnel in most circumstances, and point out that even present incumbents to advance their status will usually be required to take competitive examinations.

The passage of this bill is an essential step in developing a permanent public-career service.

Statement by Fred B. Linton, Washington representative of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce, for Henry Reining, Jr., chairman of the National Committee on Public Personnel Standards:

Mr. LINTON. I appear before this committee at this time to reaffirm the support of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce for legislation such as H. R. 960, now before the committee. I say "reaffirm" because I appeared before the committee 2 years ago and stated at that time the interest of the junior chamber in the establishment and the extension of the merit system in public employment.

The United States Junior Chamber of Commerce is an organization of young business and professional men between the ages of 21 and 35 in over 550 local communities, with an active membership of well over 100,000. A great many of the State and local organizations have committees which are actively engaged in extending the civil-service movement.

There is also included letters from Leo E. George, president, National Federation of Post Office Clerks, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor; the Honorable Charles Edison, Secretary of the Navy; the American Association of University Women and others; the Honorable John M. Carmody, Administrator, Federal Works Agency; Dr. Leonard D. White, of the University of Chicago, who is a former Republican member of the United States Civil Service Commission; James B. Burns, national president of the American Federation of Government Employees; an excerpt from the Annual Report of the National Civil Service Reform League, now headed by Samuel H. Ordway, a former Republican member of the Civil Service Commission; a statement from the United States Civil Service Commission relative to statements of J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation; a letter from the United States Civil Service Commission, bearing upon statements made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOSER] on yesterday; and a letter from the United States Civil Service Commission relative to the procedure followed in noncompetitive examinations and the recent results of such examinations.

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF POST OFFICE CLERKS,
Washington, D. C., May 8, 1939.

Hon. ROBERT RAMSPECK,
Chairman, Committee on the Civil Service,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: May I not at this time extend to you my sincere congratulations upon the progress of H. R. 960, which has been reported favorably to the House of Representatives.

You will recall that when your committee had before it a similar bill in the Seventy-fifth Congress, hearings were held and I appeared there and expressed to the committee the views of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks which were, briefly, that we favor strongly the extension of the classified civil service to embrace all positions in the Federal Government service except those that are in fact policy forming. Also that our organization was definitely on record as being opposed to recruitment into classified civil-service positions through noncompetitive examinations.

At that time, I also expressed the hope that the committee would so amend the bill as to include within its scope the clerks in third-class post offices and special-delivery messengers in the Postal Service. I regret that such provisions have not been included in H. R. 960.

In respect to established services, of which clerical positions in third-class post offices and special-delivery messengers would be examples, it would be palpably unfair to throw such positions open to competitive examination without suitable provision for credits for service and experience.

In any extension of the classified civil service to additional groups the first and most potent reason for doing so, namely, the improvement of efficiency and the public service, must be given first consideration. It is obvious, therefore, that employees already employed and rendering satisfactory service should be given every reasonable opportunity for retention. It is recognized that open competitive examinations for thousands of positions now held by employees rendering satisfactory service would seriously disrupt those services and also work a serious injustice to thousands of faithful employees.

In the development and expansion of the classified civil service it has been customary to classify groups of positions and to blanket into the civil service all incumbents. I believe that your bill, H. R. 960, offers the fairest and most practicable method of extending the merit system and hope that favorable action will be taken by Congress at an early date.

I am appending herewith a copy of the resolution adopted by the convention of the American Federation of Labor, October 13, 1938. This resolution was introduced by the organizations of civil-service employees affiliated to the American Federation of Labor.

Sincerely yours,

LEO E. GEORGE, President.

EXTENSION AND IMPROVEMENT OF UNITED STATES CIVIL-SERVICE SYSTEM

Whereas we believe an equitable merit system for all Government employees, as exemplified by the classified civil service, to be the only system guaranteeing efficient and loyal service to the Government and just employment conditions to employees: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor in this its fifty-eighth annual convention, reaffirm its unqualified endorsement of the extension of the merit system to all employees of the United States Government except those in positions which the President may determine to be policy-determining in fact; and be it further

Resolved, That the executive council be instructed to continue cooperation with the affiliated organizations of Government employees in their efforts to secure through legislation and Executive orders such extension of the classified civil service.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 15, 1940.

Mr. JAMES B. BURNS,
President, American Federation of Government Employees,
900 F Street NW., Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BURNS: Replying to your letter of January 5, 1940, in which you invite me to appear at your meeting on Wednesday, January 17, I regret that, owing to a previous engagement, it will be impossible for me to be there. Referring to the request for a brief statement from me to be read before a mass meeting of Government employees in observance of National Civil Service Week, I submit the following comments:

At this time, when the civilian personnel of the Navy Department in all the various categories is being rapidly expanded by virtue of the requirements of the naval building program and the recruitment of this personnel is of such vital importance, the Department is in an unique position to comment regarding the civil-service system, particularly in its relation to employment.

The increase of Navy Department personnel, which during recent months has assumed almost unprecedented proportions, has necessitated such constant and urgent demands upon the facilities of the Civil Service Commission as would clearly demonstrate the practicability and effectiveness of the merit system.

To meet this situation the Civil Service Commission has been required to announce a multiplicity of examinations and to determine the eligibility of vast numbers of applicants. In many instances, due to the comparative scarcity of persons qualified for certain phases of shipbuilding work, it has been necessary to announce some of these examinations repeatedly and to give studied consideration to the means of providing and maintaining adequate registers of eligibles.

The Civil Service Commission has been constructively cooperative, has given sympathetic consideration to the Navy Department's personnel problems generally, and has displayed a most commendable attitude. It is most gratifying to me to be able to attest that under these unusual circumstances the civil-service system has been highly satisfactory.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES EDISON.

FEBRUARY 7, 1940.

To Members of Congress:

Enactment of the Ramspeck bill (H. R. 960) will be an important milestone in the development of the merit system in the Federal civil service. The bill authorizes extension of the civil-service system to positions now exempt by law and extension of the Classification Act to the field service.

Employees holding the positions that will become part of the classified service under the terms of the bill will be required to meet tests to determine their eligibility for a classified status. If they fail to meet such tests, they will have to be dismissed. This is a fair and practical solution of the problem that always arises when the civil-service system is extended to positions once exempted. In no similar extension of the civil-service system has there ever been provided such careful tests to determine the ability of the persons holding the positions. In previous extensions the incumbent achieved classified status automatically with the job.

The undersigned organizations support the Ramspeck bill. They urge you to support it. It will go a long way toward freeing Congress from the burden of patronage. Extension of the merit system in the Federal civil service should result in greatly improved governmental administration.

FEDERAL WORKS AGENCY,
Washington, January 20, 1940.

Hon. ROBERT RAMSPECK,
Chairman, Committee on the Civil Service,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. RAMSPECK: When I submitted to the Bureau of the Budget an estimate of appropriations for my office as Federal Works Administrator I suggested that there be included in the language to be submitted by the President to the Congress through the Bureau of the Budget a provision that would authorize the application of the civil-service laws to the personnel here employed.

The Director of the Bureau of the Budget and the President agreed with these suggestions and they were transmitted to the Congress in the Budget for 1941 on page 158, the language as follows:

"* * * Provided further, That 6 months after the date of the approval of this act, notwithstanding any provisions of law to the contrary, all persons employed in the Office of the Administrator shall be appointed by the Administrator in accordance with the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended: And provided further, That all such persons, 6 months after the date of the approval of this act, regardless of the method by which they were appointed, who do not have a competitive classified civil-service status shall acquire such a status upon recommendation by the Administrator and certification by him to the Civil Service Commission that such persons have rendered satisfactory service in said establishment for not less than 6 months and upon passing such suitable noncompetitive tests as the Civil Service Commission shall prescribe."

In its report to the House of Representatives the Committee on Appropriations eliminated this language and made the point that in its opinion such provision should be made by other legislation and not in the appropriations act. The statement of the committee may be found in its Report on the Independent Offices Appropriation Bill for 1941 at page 15.

I take no position on the method by which the application of the civil-service laws to the personnel of my office should be accomplished, except that it should be done and I respectfully refer the matter to you for such action as you may think is proper in the premises to accomplish the result.

Respectfully yours,

JOHN M. CARMODY,
Administrator.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO,
DEPARTMENT OF POLITICAL SCIENCE,
January 23, 1940.

The Honorable ROBERT RAMSPECK,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN RAMSPECK: I am taking the liberty of writing to you as a former member of the United States Civil Service Commission to express the earnest hope that H. R. 960 will be favorably acted upon by the House of Representatives and by the Senate. Its passage would open the way for action by the President by means of Executive order to place within the competitive classified service those permanent employees who are now by law required to remain in the exempt class. The enactment of this law is the principal step which now needs to be taken in support of the platform pledges of both the Democratic and Republican Parties. Furthermore, it is the practical way of insuring the maintenance of high standards of character, competence, and impartiality which are associated with the permanent civil service of the Federal Government.

With best personal wishes, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

LEONARD D. WHITE.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1940.

The Honorable ROBERT RAMSPECK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. RAMSPECK: As you know, the American Federation of Government Employees has been most ardently supporting H. R. 960 ever since its introduction by you in the House. In fact, our national executive council, which is composed of members from all parts of the country, appeared before the House Civil Service Committee 2 years ago favoring similar legislation.

We are extremely interested in the passage of this bill, as we have consistently favored enactment of such a measure since the inception of our organization, and its enactment into law will be an occasion for deep satisfaction on the part of the American Federation of Government Employees.

Of course, we realize that there are some positions of a confidential or policy-making nature which probably ought to remain in the exempt class, but we strongly feel that extension of the merit system to hundreds of thousands of positions now exempt is of the utmost importance to the public welfare and to good administration.

We fully recognize the necessity for holding a noncompetitive examination following the enactment of H. R. 960, as this will insure adequate qualifications on the part of any employees who will be retained in their positions. The American Federation of Government Employees strongly favors competitive examinations for Government positions under ordinary circumstances, but the cost and inconvenience in this instance would be prohibitive.

The importance of this measure is that it will fulfill completely the aim of the President to extend the merit system upward, outward, and downward, and we sincerely hope that this bill will be enacted into law and thus afford Government employees a real career service.

Respectfully yours,

JAMES B. BURNS,
National President.

The 1939 annual report of the National Civil Service Reform League states the following about H. R. 960:

"The Ramspeck bill, which will be before the Congress at the coming session, has been approved for passage by the House Civil Service Committee. It is the only practical plan for the extension of the classified service which has been endorsed by the platforms of both parties. It should have the approval of Republicans and Democrats alike. Its adoption will prove a boon to both major political parties in relieving them of the pressure of patronage claims which neither party can ever hope to satisfy. Failure of adoption of the Ramspeck bill early in the next session of the Congress will make the 300,000 unclassified positions a prize or a grab bag for the professional politicians after the 1940 election."

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 8, 1940.

MR. RAMSPECK: The United States Civil Service Commission has noted the testimony of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, before the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives relative to the inclusion of positions in his Bureau under the Federal classified civil service.

This is not, of course, the first time that Mr. Hoover has given expression to his views relative to civil service. The Civil Service Commission is glad, therefore, to present its side of the matter so that the country will clearly understand the facts in the case.

In his testimony Mr. Hoover states that he is "as strong a champion of the merit system as, I believe, any official of the Government."

Obviously the principal difference between Mr. Hoover and the Civil Service Commission is that Mr. Hoover wants to operate a civil service personally and without regard to the democratic principles of (a) open competition and (b) equal opportunity which the American people, through Congress, have insisted should be a part of the Federal merit system.

The Civil Service Commission, on the other hand, is not only bound by law to operate a merit system in conformity with the principles laid down by Congress but, in addition, believes wholeheartedly in those principles not only as an ideal but also as a practical method of operation in a democratic society.

The conflict between the Bureau of Investigation and the Civil Service Commission is the age-old conflict between those who believe that the best interests of society will be served by placing all power in the hands of a single individual in the name of efficiency, and those who believe that such a practice is not only dangerous but that, in the final analysis, democratic processes will produce the best results whether one applies to them the test of efficiency or the test of bringing the people to the point where they have implicit confidence in the fairness of their Government.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation has shown a complete unwillingness to work with the United States Civil Service Commission in an effort to demonstrate that the democratic methods of selecting personnel for the Federal Government can be made to work.

Mr. Hoover complains to the Appropriations Committee concerning the character of certain individuals certified to him by the Civil Service Commission for student fingerprint classifier. Applicants for these positions were not investigated by the Commission, because Mr. Hoover's Bureau assured the Commission that it could make these investigations promptly. In fact, the Bureau of Investigation stated that even though the Commission did make such investigations they would also investigate the persons certified.

Under these circumstances, the Commission agrees with the following statement taken from a recent letter of Mr. Hoover's:

"In those cases where the Civil Service Commission does conduct investigations a duplicate expenditure of money is involved, because the Federal Bureau of Investigation has always insisted and must insist upon its own investigation of an applicant prior to appointment, for the reason that its experience in the past has shown in many cases that information highly derogatory to applicants has been developed by the Bureau by its own investigators. The Bureau's contention has always been that the investigation of Bureau applicants must be made by officials cognizant of the Bureau's individual problems and needs."

But then Mr. Hoover, in commenting on certain cases while testifying before the Appropriations Committee, says, "Cases of that kind should not have been certified. They should have been investigated and examined by the Civil Service Commission before they were sent to us for appointment."

Obviously, this is an unfair and unwarranted observation. If Mr. Hoover had not been in a position to investigate these persons who were to work in a law-enforcement agency, the Commission would have done so in conformity with its usual practice in connection with law-enforcement positions.

Also, in connection with the subject of character investigations, Mr. Hoover says, "We have been advised with regard to Communists that unless we could find something other than their communistic views or tendencies we must accept them."

The policy of the United States Civil Service Commission on this point is clear. The Commission has not had and could not have the slightest sympathy with any group or person which seeks to overthrow or undermine the United States or its present form of government, and is opposed to having any such persons actually enter the employ of the Federal Government.

The Commission refuses, however, to place any individual or group of individuals in this category until it has evidence which would justify its action. In days such as these, it is very easy for situations to develop whereby individuals are "labeled" without any justification for the label. The Commission, like every other branch of the Government, should do everything within its power to prevent United States citizens from being subjected to such unjust treatment.

Whenever it can be established that any individual believes in or advocates the overthrow of our constitutional form of government in the United States, the Commission will disqualify him for Government employment no matter what political party or organization he may or may not belong to. It demands facts, however, before it takes drastic action of this kind.

In the case of persons investigated by Mr. Hoover, however, the Commission finds it difficult to obtain the facts in view of the fact that the Federal Bureau of Investigation has refused to permit inspection by the Commission of reports obtained by its investigators, but is willing only to acquaint the Commission with excerpts and with the investigators' conclusions. This sometimes means that the Commission must reinvestigate cases already investigated by Mr. Hoover.

In other words, if Mr. Hoover were in sympathy with the Federal merit system as it has been established by Congress, and if he were willing to work with the agency charged with its administration, he would find, just as the heads of other law-enforcement agencies have found, that there would be no difficulty at all in obtaining persons of the highest character.

In this connection it is interesting to note that Mr. Hoover's Bureau is unwilling to cooperate with the United States Civil Service Commission in its effort to keep out of other Government agencies persons of poor character. The Bureau has recently, in violation of a rule of the President of the United States, refused to open up personnel files of its former employees to investigators of the Civil Service Commission who were in the process of conducting character investigations to determine whether or not those employees should be certified to other agencies.

In his testimony Mr. Hoover also says: "It is almost physically impossible to devise any all-covering written examination which would secure the services of persons meeting our peculiar needs in the matter of qualifications and personal characteristics."

The Civil Service Commission agrees with Mr. Hoover. Furthermore, in testing for investigative positions, it does not and would not confine itself to a written test. It would include an oral examination and a character investigation, and Mr. Hoover's Bureau could designate some of its skilled persons to cooperate with the Commission in the holding of such examinations.

The issue is clear. The Civil Service Commission believes in operating a merit system based on the democratic standards of open competition and equal opportunity for all. Mr. Hoover believes in a merit system which is operated by one individual. Because of his beliefs Mr. Hoover has refused to give the system on which the American people have placed their stamp of approval a fair chance to operate and, in an effort to remain aloof from it, has indulged in misrepresentations regarding that system.

The American system of open competition could and would select persons of the highest character and competence for Mr. Hoover's Bureau just as it has for such agencies as the Intelligence Unit of the Internal Revenue Bureau, the Secret Service, the Customs Service, the Post Office Inspection Service, and the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1940.

Hon. ROBERT RAMSPECK,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. RAMSPECK: Reference is made to your request which was received last night for information concerning the third-class postmaster examination for West Leesport, Pa.

Let me say that the Civil Service Commission believes in a vigorous enforcement of section 9 of the Hatch Act. The Commission has not had, and could not possibly have, the slightest sympathy with any person or group of persons seeking to overthrow or undermine the United States or its present form of government, and is opposed to the appointment or retention in the service of any such person. The Commission refuses, however, to place any individual or group of individuals in this category until it has evidence which would justify such action.

An examination was held for the position of third-class postmaster at West Leesport, Pa., and the investigation was made by the confidential inquiry system. Three eligibles were certified to the Post Office Department, among them Mrs. Verna G. Phillips, whose name stood No. 2 on the list. Shortly thereafter, Congressman GUY L. MOSER complained of Mrs. Phillips' suitability for the position of postmaster, and transmitted with his letter photostat copies of documents sent to him in connection with pending legislation, some of which were signed personally by Mrs. Phillips and others of which are in the form of a petition signed by Mrs. Phillips and others. One of these documents is a telegram signed by Mrs. Phillips, representing the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union, Centerport and Mount Pleasant Locals, and three other persons, stating that the Berks County delegation to the American Congress for Peace and Democracy requests the Congressman to do everything in his power to lift the embargo against Republican Spain; to place it on Germany, Italy, and Japan, and to support President Roosevelt in his struggle to preserve democracy.

The second document is a printed circular signed by Mrs. Phillips. This circular is addressed to "Mr. Congressman," requesting him to support the President's request for an additional W. P. A. appropriation and indicating that, if he does not, the signer will hold him personally responsible if W. P. A. workers are laid off, if business suffers, and recovery is crippled in the district which the Congressman represents.

The third document is signed by Mrs. Phillips, representing the American League for Peace and Democracy, and urges the Congressman to oppose various bills which have been introduced designed to increase restriction on the civil rights of foreign-born.

The fourth and last document is signed by Mrs. Phillips, in company with others, and urges the Congressman to support the repeal of the then existing Neutrality Act to place an embargo on aggressor nations and to support the so-called Thomas amendment.

Upon receipt of Congressman MOSER's complaint, the Commission directed that personal investigation be made of the character and suitability of all applicants for the position of postmaster at West Leesport, Pa. During the investigation a large number of representative patrons of the West Leesport office were interviewed. These included representative business and professional people, representatives of labor groups, and women's organizations, and others. An effort was made to obtain a good cross section of public opinion regarding the qualifications and suitability of all the applicants. The testimony was, on the whole, favorable to Mrs. Phillips, and a great majority of the persons interviewed felt that she was qualified and suitable for appointment. As a result of this investigation, Mrs. Phillips's name, together with the names of two other eligibles, was recertified to the Post Office Department.

Subsequently, Congressman MOSER again complained with respect to Mrs. Phillips's suitability for appointment; and after a careful review of the case the Commission recently decided that, while there was some evidence which would make advisable further investigation, the Commission would not be justified in removing Mrs. Phillips's name from the register on the basis of the evidence thus far secured. It was therefore decided to make a further investigation of the case with special reference to certain organizations with which Mrs. Phillips has been affiliated, concerning which there is very meager evidence before the Commission. A short time ago the Post Office Department was requested to withhold action on the certificate issued for postmaster at West Leesport, Pa., until the Commission could make additional inquiry into the case.

I shall be very glad to advise you further concerning this case as soon as additional investigation has been made and final action taken as to Mrs. Phillips' suitability for appointment.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY B. MITCHELL, President.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1940.

Hon. ROBERT RAMSPECK,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. RAMSPECK: The Commission appreciates greatly your defense of the merit system before the House yesterday. In order that there may be no question raised as to your statement as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1258, as to the content of the Commission's noncompetitive examinations, I would point out that on page 38 of the hearings before your committee on H. R. 960 last March, it is stated that the Commission had decided some time before that in noncompetitive examinations experience would be considered as a factor and be given a relative weight of at least 25 percent. In the noncompetitive examination where a written test is given such test is very similar to the written test in the open competitive examination.

You will also be interested to know that, based on a total of 20,496 cases considered for classification during the period from July 1938 to December 1939 (1½ years), 14,603 were allowed and 2,283 disallowed, with 3,610 not recommended for classification by the heads of the respective offices but recommended for retention without acquiring a classified status. In this group there is included a total of 4,548 cases in the Postal Service divided—4,426 allowed and 122 disallowed.

Eliminating the 3,610 cases not recommended for classification, the percentages are 13.5 percent failures including the Postal Service, and 17.5 percent failures excluding the Postal Service. If consideration is given to the 3,610 cases not recommended for classification the percentages are increased to 28.7 percent of failures including the Postal Service and 36.1 percent of failures excluding the Postal Service.

Very sincerely yours,

HARRY B. MITCHELL, President.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for 3 minutes in order to ask the chairman of the committee two or three questions if he will be kind enough to answer them.

The distinguished gentleman from Georgia, who is promoting this bill, which I may vote for, as much as I dislike it and as distasteful as it is, because I think the chairman has gone far afield in opening this up by the covering of these employees without competitive examination, two or three times has made the remark that this will cover into the civil service employees who have been with the Government for several years, such as revenue agents, and employees of that type. In the gentleman's opinion, how many of these two or three hundred thousand employees are old employees? How many of them have 5 years' service or more?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I will say frankly to the gentleman that the vast majority of them are people with not more than 6 or 7 years of service; but there are quite a number—I do not know the exact number—deputy collectors of internal revenue, for instance, who have been in the Government service and have been in civil service and out two or three times by operation of acts of Congress, but who have been retained because of their ability and knowledge of the tax laws, who would be covered under this bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I know that to be a fact, but I was interested in the great number there must be of those outside who have not been with the Government very long. Would the chairman have any objection to an amendment, which I understand will be offered to this bill, to the effect that all of these employees will be taken care of up until January 1, 1941, and that subsequent to that time they must submit to competitive examination?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; I would object to that, because I have been convinced by the testimony before our committee that to apply competitive examinations to large groups of employees already in the service would disrupt the service.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That kind of an amendment would allow at least a year for them to adjust themselves. But let us go a step further. Would the gentleman object to that being applied as of January 1, 1942? In other words, I want to find out if the gentleman is really interested in a genuine civil-service bill or does he want to blanket these people in under civil service?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of course, neither the gentleman from Michigan nor I can by our own statements convince anybody about that. For 10 years I have been a member of the Civil Service Committee and have advocated extension of the civil service. I have voted against exemptions from the civil service on every opportunity that arose.

I introduced the first bill. I was convinced by the testimony, not only of the members of the Civil Service Commission but of Mr. Elliot H. Kaplan, of the National Civil Service Reform League, the representative of the League of Women Voters, the Business and Professional Women, and others, that it was not practical to bring in agencies already created and in existence, and that it never has been followed by any administration as a policy. Not only that, but it has not followed in the States and cities where existing agencies were brought in.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, this bill goes far afield from the bill which we should have before us. Why the committee has moved away from competitive examinations is something that, in my opinion, can never be explained satisfactorily to our people, who want real civil service to apply to Government employees. But we face the reality that the committee will not bring a real civil-service proposal to this floor. We further face the fact that those who are really studying the question in the majority want a civil-service law; and, further, we hope this proposal can be amended in a manner that will provide for competitive examinations. If the country is in the final analysis dissatisfied with this measure in the form in which it is enacted into law, the Congress can at some future date make such amendments in the law as will meet popular support. I shall support the motion to recommit the bill for the inclusion of the Rogers amendment in the hope that competitive examinations can be made to apply. Finally, I shall support the bill and hope that before it becomes law the Congress will make it a better measure than it is in the form in which it is here presented.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 7 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from Massachusetts is recognized for 7 minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I hope the chairman of the committee is listening, because he made the statement yesterday that the Committee appointed by the President, known as the President's Committee for Civil Service Improvement, did not take up all branches of the civil service; that it only took up the employment of lawyers. After further and full investigation I found out, just as I thought, that the President's idea was to have that Committee consider the improvement of all branches of the civil service.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield, although the gentleman from Georgia would not yield to me yesterday.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think the gentlewoman misunderstood me. I said yesterday that the Reed committee was not to investigate the desirability of bringing in these new agencies. I did say they were to make recommendations as to the technique of procedure.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. That, of course, includes the other. I cannot yield further; I am very sorry. I will yield later if I have time.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to introduce later on an amendment which will allow everyone, who wants to, to vote to promote the merit system in the civil service; in other words, it will provide that these 250,000 or 300,000 people shall have a chance—more than even chance—with people on the outside to take an open competitive examination and to pass it.

I draw the attention of the Committee for the moment to the extremely shameful treatment of those already on the civil-service register. There are on the civil-service registers today nearly 1,000,000 people eligible for employment in the Government service but not employed; yet 300,000 people have been appointed to Federal positions without examination. Permit me also, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the membership to the fact that many hundreds of people who are paid through W. P. A. funds and other funds are now working in the departments side by side with civil-service workers; some of the non-civil-service employees in the lower brackets are paid a lower wage than the civil-service employees, but in the higher brackets some of the non-civil-service employees working side by side with the civil-service employees in many instances receive higher salaries than do the civil-service employees.

So much lip service has been paid to the merit system by this administration, but the right hand does one thing and the left hand does another. I feel most strongly that we owe a duty to those we have asked to take civil-service examinations, people who in many instances have worked hard to qualify themselves for the examination and passed it. I feel we have a very sacred duty to see that their rights are protected.

If we have a merit system, if we have a civil service, let us abide by it. England has a real merit system, a real civil service. We hear no complaints from anyone in England about their civil-service system. For 20 centuries China has had an excellent merit system. The Government employees of China must pass examinations. They are well trained, well informed, and do excellent work.

Many of those in the Government service today on civil service do not dare complain about this bill which will blanket in some 300,000 people. Mr. Mitchell testified that only 25 percent of the non-civil-service employees of the Government could pass an open competitive civil-service examination. It seems to me it is clearly a subterfuge to blanket in political appointees. I am just as critical of the Republicans who did that sort of thing as I am of the Democrats. I deplore the fact that the Republican administrations did not always follow the merit system; but I bring to your attention the fact that in no instance before did either the Republican or Democratic Party try to blanket in 300,000 people. Permit me also to state that no party before, neither Democrat nor Republican, ever abused—and I call it abuse—so many persons on the civil-service register. No party before ever gave the Civil Service Commission the work to do, underpaid, understaffed as it is, that this administration has. Do you realize that as a result of one examination alone held over a year ago 272,000 persons have not yet received their ratings? I think that was an examination for inspectors. In another instance an examination held a year ago was rated only the 3d of January of this year, an examination for stenographers, and 70,000 who took it are waiting to be appointed to civil-service jobs.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Would the gentlewoman care to inform the House as to the effect this bill would have on veterans' preference legislation? Is it a fact that it means that over 300,000 people being frozen in the service, that in connection with these positions the veterans' preference laws of the country have been completely ignored?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. That is absolutely true, they have been ignored. Under this bill the veterans will be given no preference. It is also a fact, however, that the veterans have been ignored in many ways before under civil service because, though having been granted their civil-service preference, they have not been preferred in receiving positions.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH].

CIVIL SERVICE BY PRECEDENT AND BY STATISTIC

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, while many of the honorable Members on the left are on their way to do deference in various parts of the country to the memory of the great national saint from my State, Abraham Lincoln, we Democrats today are preparing, in the quietude of our admiration, to celebrate also Lincoln's all-American spirit. I would like to call your attention, in the gracious mood of his birthday, to a diagnosis by one of Lincoln's friends as to what it was that made this son of Illinois so great.

LINCOLN'S WISDOM COMMENDED AS EXAMPLE ON CIVIL SERVICE

It was Leonard Swett who said that Lincoln succeeded in politics—

By ignoring men and * * * all small causes, but by closely calculating the tendencies of events and the great forces which were producing logical results. * * * The whole world to him was a question of cause and effect. * * * His tactics were to get himself in the right place and remain there until events would find him in that place.

I commend those tactics to my Republican friends and to my Democratic friends alike. We are heirs of intelligence to understand the great force of politics in our country at this time. It is good tactics to have foresight enough to get ourselves in the right places and to wait there, as Lincoln waited, for events to overtake us. We have a chance today to get right with history on a matter of great importance to our Nation. I am going to leave here on the table a document so every speaker can cast his eye on it if he is tempted to get off-sided as touching forthcoming events. A glance at these photostats may save some of us from appealing to individual cases as though they were typical, or from resorting to gossip as significant in a world where cause and effect does reign supreme as Lincoln knew.

What are the tendencies with reference to the civil service? Here is a photostatic copy of a document which indicates in curves the line of growth since 1883. You will see that while there are zigzags in terms of this year or that, the total course of national events has been to take out of the hands of us politicians what scrupulous minds would long ago have foregone. Since the civil service is our collective effort, and the only one, to improve the administrative service, we are estopped from criticizing it until we have completed its scope, supported its budget, or have developed some better alternative. Promotion by pull and demotion by push is no alternative to civil service. This chart shows that the movement has been upward and onward without substantial recession. Look at these curves of progress and stifle any extravagant remarks.

PARTY PROMISES AS SYMBOLS OF PROGRESS

I have here also photostatic copies of the platform promises of both our great parties since the year 1900. I am glad to observe that the Republican platform got the jump on us that year. Let that be a symbol of the wisdom of the Republicans jumping on the band wagon today. In opposite columns you will see the drift of things in terms of the maintenance of the integrity of the parties at the level of promises.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM	REPUBLICAN PLATFORM
1900
Kansas City, Mo., July	Philadelphia, Pa., June
No resolution.	We commend the policy of the Republican Party in maintaining the efficiency of the civil service.
1904
St. Louis, Mo., July	Chicago, Ill., June
The Democratic Party stands committed to the principles of civil-service reform, and we demand their honest, just, and impartial enforcement. We denounce the Republican Party for its continuous and sinister encroachments upon the spirit and operation of civil-service rules, whereby it has arbitrarily dispensed with examination for office in the interests of favorites and employed all manner of devices to overreach and set aside the principles upon which the civil service was established.	The civil-service law was placed on the statute books by the Republican Party, which has always sustained it, and we renew our former declarations that it shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced.
Denver, Colo., July	Chicago, Ill., June
The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rigidly enforced, to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion, rather than services rendered to a political party.	We reaffirm our former declarations regarding the civil-service law.
Baltimore, Md., June–July	Chicago, Ill., June
The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rightly enforced, to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than service rendered to a political party; and we favor a reorganization of the civil service, with adequate compensation commensurate with the class of work performed, for all officers and employees; we also recommend the extension to all classes of civil-service employees of the benefits of the provisions of the employers' liability law; we also recognize the right of direct petition to Congress by employees for the redress of grievance.	We reaffirm our adherence to the principle of appointment to public office based on proved fitness, and tenure during good behavior and efficiency. The Republican Party stands committed to the maintenance, extension, and enforcement of the civil-service law, and it favors the passage of legislation empowering the President to extend competitive service so far as practicable. We favor legislation to make possible the equitable retirement of disabled and superannuated members of the civil service, in order that a higher standard of efficiency may be maintained. We favor the amendment of the Federal employers' liability law so as to extend its provisions to all Government employees, as well as to provide a more liberal scale of compensation for injury and death.
St. Louis, Mo., June	Chicago, Ill., June
We hold that the life, health, and strength of the men, women, and children of the Nation are its greatest asset, and that in the conservation of these the Federal Government, wherever it acts as the employer of labor, should both on its own account and as an example, put into effect the following principles of just employment: 1. A living wage for all employees. 2. A working day not to exceed 8 hours, with 1 day of rest in 7. 3. The adoption of safety appliances and the establishment of thoroughly sanitary conditions of labor. 4. Adequate compensation for industrial accidents. 5. The standards of the uniform child-labor law wherever minors are employed. 6. Such provisions for decency, comfort, and health in the employment of women as should be accorded the mothers of the race. 7. An equitable retirement law providing for the retirement of superannuated and disabled employees of the civil service, to the end that a higher standard of efficiency may be maintained. We reaffirm our declarations for the rigid enforcement of the civil-service laws.	The civil-service law has always been sustained by the Republican Party, and we renew our repeated declarations that it shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable. The Democratic Party has created since March 4, 1913, 30,000 offices outside of the civil-service law, at an annual cost of $44,000,000 to the taxpayers of the country. We condemn the gross abuse and the misuse of the law by the present Democratic administration and pledge ourselves to a reorganization of this service along lines of efficiency and economy.
San Francisco, Calif., June–July	Chicago, Ill., June
We advocate * * * a reclassification of the Federal civil service free from discrimination on the ground of sex. We commend the work of the joint commission on the reclassification of salaries of postal employees, recently concluded, which commission was created by a Democratic administration. The Democratic Party has always favored and will continue to favor the fair and just treatment of all Government employees.	We renew our repeated declaration that the civil-service law shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable. The recent action of Congress in enacting a comprehensive civil-service retirement law and in working out a comprehensive employment and wage policy that will guarantee equal and just treatment to the army of Government workers and in centralizing the administration of the new and progressive employment policy in the hands of the Civil Service Commission is worthy of all praise. The principle of equal pay for equal service should be applied throughout all branches of the Federal Government in which women are employed.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM—CON.	REPUBLICAN PLATFORM—CON.
New York, N. Y., June–July	Cleveland, Ohio, June
We pledge the Democratic Party faithfully to comply with the spirit as well as the regulation of civil service; to extend its provisions to internal-revenue officers and to other employees of the Government not in executive positions, and to secure to ex-service men preference in such appointments.	The improvement in the enforcement of the merit system both by legislative enactment and Executive action since March 4, 1921, has been marked and effective. By Executive order the appointment of Presidential postmasters has been placed on the merit basis similar to that applying to the classified service. We favor the classification of postmasters in first-, second-, and third-class post offices and placing of the prohibition enforcement field force within the classified civil service without necessarily incorporating all the present personnel.
Houston, Tex., June–July	Kansas City, Mo., June
Grover Cleveland made the extension of the merit system a tenet of our political faith. We shall preserve and maintain the civil service.	The merit system in Government service originated with, and has been developed by, the Republican Party. The great majority of our public-service employees are now secured through and maintained in the Government-service rules. Steps have already been taken by the Republican Congress to make the service more attractive as to wages and retirement privileges, and we commend what has been done as a step in the right direction.
Chicago, Ill., June–July	Chicago, Ill., June
We advocate the spread of employment by a substantial reduction in the hours of labor; the encouragement of the shorter week by applying that principle in Government service.	The merit system has been amply justified since the organization of the civil service by the Republican Party. As a part of our governmental system, it is now unassailable. We believe it should remain so.
1936
Philadelphia, Pa., June	Cleveland, Ohio, June
For the protection of Government itself and promotion of its efficiency, we pledge the immediate extension of the merit system through the classified civil service—which was first established and fostered under Democratic auspices—to all non-policy-making positions in the Federal service. We shall subject to the civil-service law all continuing positions which, because of the emergency, have been exempt from its operation.	Under the New Deal, official authority has been given to inexperienced and incompetent persons. The civil service has been sacrificed to create a national political machine. As a result, the Federal Government has never presented such a picture of confusion and inefficiency. We pledge ourselves to the merit system, virtually destroyed by New Deal spoilsmen. It should be restored, improved, and extended. We will provide such conditions as offer an attractive permanent career in Government service to young men and women of ability, irrespective of party affiliations.

The only substantial competition between the parties, as regards promises, is, as you will observe, the counterclaim by each as to which one started the civil service and which of them has been its best friend. The Republicans assert twice that they began it and the Democrats assert it once. I do not care who began it, but it is time for us both to unite upon its completion. We as individual politicians come and go, but this great Government of ours goes on, we hope, forever. Its permanent service must be a matter of merit, not of gossip, not of grievance, not of narrow party loyalty or sectional quota pride. We vote today upon whether we shall turn over personnel problems to those who study them, know about them, and are constituted to solve them—or whether we continue to commit "the civic turpitude of political partisanship in matters administrative."

A PHONY QUARREL

When you attend to the quarrel now raging as to the noncompetitive nature of our proposed examination, you do well to keep perspective by consulting the record. Only two Republican Presidents ever arranged for any examinations at all for those blanketed in. Calvin Coolidge brought in about 2,000 by noncompetitive examination and Herbert Hoover about 200. That is all there is in the precedent of Republicanism to give body to the cries heard here today from that side of the House. Behold the mountain of verbal virtue labors and only a little mouse of merit is historically born.

Practically speaking, it is, therefore, a petty quarrel, it is a partisan quarrel—sometimes a personal quarrel. There might be a question as to whether we shall proceed to merit down the criminal path marked by the Hatch bill or down the civil path marked by this Ramspeck bill. But there is really no practical quarrel other than that. We are all for merit. But we Democrats are for it today the way it can be extended; the Republicans are for it but not by the only route it can be extended, or ever has been extended by them. They offer no precedent of competitive examinations when they were in power, and precious little precedent that reaches the level we propose today of noncompetitive examinations.

Since the Hatch bill deprives us all of the fruits of our political vices, why not through the Ramspeck bill grasp the fruits of our virtue?

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. Why not put those photostats in the RECORD as a part of your remarks?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I shall be very happy to put them in the RECORD and I shall ask unanimous consent to do so. [They have been inserted above for logical convenience.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does it not seem to the gentleman that it would be extremely helpful if the majority today would do better than the Republicans and have a full competitive examination, perhaps giving those not already in the service a slight advantage, the 300,000, by not holding an examination? You will be making a record for yourselves if you do that.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I have a second-rate enthusiasm for what I regard as second-rate proposals. The gentlewoman also knows that in appealing from Republican bad practice, we are appealing to Republican principles of precedent, though this precedent has been established by Democrats and Republicans alike.

History becomes the worst enemy of our progress, time makes ancient "uncouth" good. The gentlewoman knows there is no earthly possibility now nor when she wins, as she hopes to in 1940, to extend the civil service of the United States except by noncompetitive examinations or worse—no examinations at all—as the Republicans have taught us.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I believe that the country and the Republic as a whole are becoming awakened to the fact that the civil-service employees who have taken examinations have been dealt with unjustly, nearly 1,000,000 of them.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. That remains to be shown. I do not myself concede the charge. Indeed, I hesitate to yield my time to Members who may say something that a hundred years from now, if they were here, they would be sorry they said at all in the light of these curves that are up and onward.

EMPTY QUARRELS AND MEDIEVAL KINGS

I am indeed reminded by this attempted quarrel over the noncompetitive examination of the story told of two medieval kings who had lived in amity and peace, side by side like Republicans and Democrats, for many a year. One day one of them had unexpected company. He sent a hurriedly scribbled note over to the other one, "Send me a blue pig with a yellow tail or—" scribbling off unintelligently in his haste.

When the other king got his note he was insulted by it. He looked at it and he looked again. Finally he said, "Well, I will send him as good as he sends me," and he sent back this reply, "I have no blue pig with a yellow tail, and if I did have," blank, blank, blank.

The first king was angry and declared war. The second king arose to defend his national honor and his territorial integrity. They fought and they fought until their ships had been sunk and their armies exhausted. Meeting at the conference table at last, as all such foolish ones must, the one said to the other, "Why did you send me that insulting note? We had been friends for a long time." The other said, "I did not send you an insulting note, but you did send me an insulting reply. I said, 'Send me a blue pig with a yellow tail, or, if you do not have that kind of a pig, send me any kind you have. I am in need of some meat.' " The other said, "Well, if that is what you meant, my reply was not insulting at all. I meant I had no blue pig with a yellow tail, but if I did have I would very gladly send it to my fellow sovereign, and my neighbor."

Similarly fictitious, from a practical point of view, is the quarrel we are staging here over the noncompetitive examination. I wish we might have competitive examinations myself; but I am not God, and I am not the director of the Democratic Party, and I am not responsible for the long precedent of the Republican Party. The truth is that the only way we ever have advanced the civil service, will now advance it, or shall in the future advance it in the competition of demerit between the two great parties, is by giving some advantage to the party in power. That most disinterested and knowledgeable organization, the League of Women Voters, knows this. It and the many other fine organizations indicated are therefore for this bill as the only way actually to advance from patronage to merit.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Lucky is the day when we can turn from personal predilections and prejudices to the Civil Service Commission to further, as I hope from this year forward, a scientific determination of personnel policies.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I am sorry, I cannot yield. I have something here that I feel I ought to get in during the remaining 3 minutes.

FROM PRECEDENT TO A STATISTIC OR TWO

I have been arguing from a precedent, to which we all must subscribe, since it springs from both our parties. I will give you a statistic or two now that I have here in my hand. I do not really know whether I ought to do it or not. I know there is some criticism of the Central Statistical Board, and I know that some Members of the House object to things going into the RECORD that cannot be certified as true. I admit that I do not know whether these statistics are true or not, but I do suggest that—what is much more important in politics and especially in this kind of debate—they are interesting. I beg your permission, therefore, to insert them. As to their source, I say only this: They do not derive from my fine old sea captain, of the Principality of Excelsioriana.

These statistics have to do with the incidence upon Government employees during recent administrations, from Harding down, of three diseases—nervous break-downs, gastric ulcers, and hiccups. Nervous break-down, you know, is the disease that comes from work, or rather from worry about work, to those who are in the upper brackets. Gastric ulcers is the same disease that comes to the middle-income group, if they can afford it. Hiccups, however, although you may not know it, is a sort of galloping, garrulous form of gastric ulcers overtaking those who get the lowest pay.

I do not say this doctrine of disease comes from the allopaths and I do not say it comes from the homeopaths, and I am not certain whether it comes from the——

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Psychopaths.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Psychopaths; yes; it may come from the psychopaths. Whether allopaths or homeopaths or psychopaths—all these "paths," like the path of glory, lead but to the grave. Whatever the source of my putative medical insight, I have statistics that show that under Harding's regime, when there was neither too much honesty nor too much efficiency, one one-thousandth of 1 percent suffered from nervous break-down—though the morals of many more broke down—one-tenth of 1 percent from gastric ulcers, and one-half of 1 percent from hiccups.

Under Coolidge's regime, when there was honesty but not too much efficiency, the employees suffered nervous breakdowns one-hundredth of 1 percent, gastric ulcers one-fifth of 1 percent, and hiccups two-thirds of 1 percent.

Under Hoover's administration my statistical chart indicates wide prevalence of "the grouches." My chart does not further break down that gloomy classification.

Under the Roosevelt administration, this present administration, however, 1 whole percent of the higher incomes have suffered from nervous break-downs, 3 percent—mark that increase—from gastric ulcers, and 10 percent of the poorly paid employees intermittently from nervous hiccups.

THE MORAL IS CIVIL SERVICE

So what? So this, Mr. Chairman. If we can give security to our Federal employees we shall stop the ravages of these diseases. Persons who carry on the permanent work of our National Government are entitled to psychological conditions which turn idealism into service rather than into senseless worry, waste, illness.

The fact is that under the New Deal there have come into the service of the Nation a great many idealistic persons, young and older. The Republicans admit this, indeed, charge it; but they say that idealists are not good administrators. No; not with hiccups or gastric ulcers. Not good administrators—these idealists so anxious about their work, so solicitous to do a good job, but suffering from the same type of insecurity—without our thick skin—that we politicians suffer from, because they are our satellites.

Detach them from our insecure patronage, give them merited tenure; and you will bring to the Federal Government the most devoted group of workers that has ever been inducted into the civil service. Earnest, able, idealistic, our Federal workers need only the added touch of security offered by this bill to convert them into a noble phalanx of efficiency for the perpetuity of our democratic state. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am very much interested in the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, that the President and this administration are willing to follow what they say is precedent in this matter of blanketing in instead of blazing the trail for open, competitive examinations. The administration has boasted that it does not follow precedent. This administration has far excelled in politically freezing persons into the Government Service. The spoils system has run riot in this administration. However, I do not like the spoils system in any party. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. For a brief question, yes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Just explain, if you will, why these officeholders are sick of this administration. The country at large is and now you tell us, if you know, why the officeholders are.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I was very much interested in the statement of the gentleman from Illinois who has just left the floor who told us about the number of those in charge of the work of the administration who are having gastric trouble and such things. I could not understand why he wanted to tell us about that in such a complaining manner.

Mr. Chairman, as I said yesterday, we are discussing, I think, one of the most important pieces of legislation that has come up on the floor of the House for many years.

I would like to answer first, briefly, some of the questions that have been put before us by our distinguished Chairman. I have the highest regard for him. I have the highest regard for his opinion on questions involving civil service, but I want to call your attention to two or three things now, if I may.

The distinguished Chairman said that he could not get much help or much assistance in getting the bill (H. R. 2700) out on the floor of the House, and therefore he did not produce it. Let me suggest to the gentleman that he has not yet asked my assistance or the assistance of the members of the minority party on that Committee to help him with that bill on the floor of the House. I will tell the gentleman here and now that before we are through with this bill I expect to offer an amendment to the bill proposing his own bill (H. R. 2700) as a substitute and I hope he will go along and support that measure. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I cannot yield now, because I do not have the time. The gentleman himself has charge of half of the time.

I would like now to call attention to one or two other matters. The gentleman talks about certain groups that are in support of this measure. I would like to call his attention to a statement made on behalf of the American Federation of Labor at the hearings on the bill H. R. 2700, that provides, if you please, for competitive examinations; and over on page 23 to a statement made by Col. Charles I. Stengle, president of the American Federation of Government Employees, who at that time made a statement and said a number of those who concurred with him in various labor organizations, stated:

> Mr. Chairman, it so happens that this bill embodies to a very large extent one of the outstanding planks in our own legislative program. We are happy indeed to know it is not only in conformance with our program but it seems there is harmony, a most unusual harmony, between the President's program, your program, and our program.

That was H. R. 2700. It proves for competitive civil-service examinations.

Then going a little further along in the hearings on the same bill, H. R. 2700, we find that Mr. Kaplan, who represents himself as speaking on behalf of the Civil Service Reform League, states, "The Ramspeck bill now before you for consideration is a proposal that our National League has advocated for a long time."

Now, I realize and appreciate the fact that these gentlemen have now come along and said, "Well, if we cannot have H. R. 2700, then we will go along with you and take this bill, H. R. 960."

The chairman of the committee himself will recall that he made a statement to the committee which, in effect, was something like this. He thought he would have a lot of difficulty in getting the majority of the Democrats of this House to support his bill, H. R. 2700.

Mr. Chairman, I believe Members of Congress and the people of this country should be given to understand definitely that the measure before us today—known as the Ramspeck bill—is not a real civil-service measure; that it is not in the interests of a competitive civil-service merit system. In discussing civil-service problems, I believe people think about measures which provide for open, competitive examinations, that will give any qualified person a chance to compete for any of the thousands of positions in the executive department of government. We have always taken it for granted that civil-service appointments are nonpolitical, and that those securing such appointments get them because they are qualified for the job and have earned it in competition with others who have applied for it. Political influence was not involved.

This bill H. R. 960 cannot be justified under these terms. Let it be understood that the purpose of this bill is to permit approximately 325,000 politically appointed employees—now in Government service—to attain civil-service rating in preference to the hundreds of thousands of qualified men and women who ought to be entitled to compete for them. These 325,000 employees who will be given preference under this bill may or may not be fitted for their jobs. In most instances I assume they are qualified, but the fact remains that they received their appointments under political patronage in preference to others who were also qualified.

I am not criticizing them for securing their jobs in that way. Not for a minute. But I do not think it is fair for Congress at this time to say to these people, in effect, "Now that you have secured your jobs by political patronage, we are going to see that you keep them. We are going to put you under civil service. We will give you the same status and similar advantages afforded to those who earned their positions as a result of competitive examinations under a merit system." I do not think it is right for the Democrats to do it, or for Republicans to do it. You do not, either. The very principle of the thing is wrong. Sponsors of this bill are going to tell you that sometime in the past similar action was taken by the administrations in power. If it did happen, even on a small scale—I am not here to justify it. You will find, however, upon investigation, that during the entire history of our Government and since our civil-service law was enacted there has never been, under any administration, or all of them, such an attempt at wholesale blanketing in of politically appointed employees as we have under this measure.

During the past 3 years 60,000 or 70,000 jobs, possibly more, have been placed under civil service by Executive order, without competitive examination. It just hapens that it takes an act of Congress to put the positions affected by this bill under civil service—otherwise an order from the President might have taken care of all of them.

Mr. Chairman, the question before the House this afternoon is whether or not you are in favor of an honest, fair, open, competitive civil-service merit system for your Government. Or do you favor a subterfuge which provides that persons now holding positions by political appointment may take what is known as a noncompetitive examination and be "frozen in" the service and given the same status as those who got their jobs on a competitive basis?

In March 1933 there were approximately 560,000 Federal employees outside of the Army, Navy, and diplomatic corps. Eighty-three percent of them were under civil service. According to a report from the Civil Service Commission on June 30, 1939, that number has grown to an all-time high of 920,310. Five hundred and sixty-two thousand nine hundred and nine, or only 66 percent, were under civil service. During the last 6 months of 1939 we added 67,000 more to that number, making a total on January 1, 1940, of 987,538. We added Government workers to the pay roll last year at the rate of 11,000 per month. We will soon have more than a million Federal employees on the pay roll.

Right here I want to call your attention to the expense of this Federal pay roll. Our distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Civil Service on the floor of the House the other day told us that the largest single item of the normal cost in operating the Government is the payment for personnel service. He said it amounts to more than a billion and one-half dollars annually, and uses up the largest single proportion of the tax dollar of the Federal Government. Surely the American taxpayer is entitled to the best service than can be provided by his tax dollar.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct your attention to another important phase of this question. In the acts creating the new bureaus and commissions, Congress deliberately exempted their employees from civil service. Congress made it specific that the appointments would be political and would not come under the direction of our civil-service program. Today the sponsors of this bill are the same persons who inaugurated that program. They are asking Congress to protect their politically appointed employees by making their positions secure and permanent. If that is the democratic way of doing things, I do not know it. I just do not see how you can justify your action if you vote for this bill.

We are told that there are more than 4,000,000 young men and women—high-school and college graduates—who have never had regular jobs. Is there any reason why they should not be entitled to compete for these positions and be appointed to hold them if they can show themselves qualified? I want to be just as fair as anyone else to the employees now on the Government pay roll. Certainly, they should have no objection to competing against someone on the outside for the jobs they hold by political patronage. Furthermore, the very fact that they are now holding these jobs gives them a distinct advantage by reason of their experience over those who may compete against them. If they can show themselves better qualified to hold the jobs than those who compete with them, all right; but if there are others on the outside who have prepared themselves for such positions, and who can show themselves better fitted to hold them, then they are entitled to have the jobs. And we, as taxpayers of this country, are entitled to their employment. I do not see how you can get around the fact that this Government is entitled to the most competent employees that can be found. If this is true, then why do you adopt a policy such as is provided under this bill? If you pass this measure, you may as well forget the question of competitive civil service altogether.

Let us stop a moment and see how this situation is to be handled. Under this proposed legislation, noncompetitive examinations will be given in the various departments of Government; that is, nobody will compete with the present employees. Some of the examinations will be oral and some of them written. If the employee is able to make a passing grade of 70 percent, he stays on the job. If there is somebody on the outside who could have passed the same examination with a grade of 80 percent or 90 percent, that does not make any difference; just so the person now in the position makes 70 percent on whatever kind of examination is provided, he keeps his place against any outsider. Do you think such a method is fair to the unemployed competent young men and women of this country?

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, there are thousands—yes; I think they run into the hundreds of thousands—of persons who are already on the eligible registers who have passed similar examinations, and who have a position on the register according to their grades. They are not entitled to be given any consideration for these places, under this bill, although they have already shown themselves qualified.

Here is another thing to which I want to call your attention very definitely. After these people have been in their positions for as long as 6 months and have acquired civil-service rating—then they will have priority over the persons now on the eligible registers in the event they are dropped from the service because they are not needed. Let me put it another way: After they receive the civil-service rating you are giving them under this bill, they will then be eligible to take similar jobs where vacancies occur in other departments of government now under civil service, having a preference over those people now on the elegible registers who think they are going to have a chance for such vacancies. You may just as well throw away practically all of the eligible registers now existing and tell the people who have taken the competitive examinations that there will not be any chance for them for years to come.

If you believe in a fair, competitive system, and if you believe in securing the most competent employees to fill these positions, you certainly are not in favor of this bill. If you believe a man or woman who has fitted himself or herself for such positions is entitled to an even break, you cannot support this measure.

In the past 2 or 3 years, under Executive order, some 60,000 or 70,000 positions have been blanketed in under civil service without competitive examinations. If you approve this bill, you add about 325,000 more. The proponents of this measure say it would take too much time, and to conduct such competitive examinations for all these positions would be extremely complicated. Personally I do not care if it takes a little time. If this Congress had started 6 years ago to remedy this situation, the problem would not confront us this afternoon. Assuming it would take 1, 2, or even 5 years, it would be better to do that than to adopt an unfair practice such as the one we are about to follow in dealing with this bill. As a matter of fact, nearly all the examinations necessary to fill such positions would be similar to the ones that are now being conducted by the Civil Service Commission for the thousands of other Government jobs.

They have told us that the Civil Service Commission does not have sufficient funds. I do not seem to be able to get much information from those in authority. But common sense will tell us that the great majority of these jobs are similar in character to those positions now being held in other departments of Government under civil service and for which examinations are being conducted right along. Certainly it would not be a great effort to conduct examinations for positions of this kind. Right now we have the names of thousands of men and women on eligible registers who have qualified as stenographers, typists, file clerks, and so forth, under competitive examinations. The least we could do is to let those who hold similar jobs outside of the civil service take similar examinations in competition with them.

Mr. Chairman, I wish you would tell me from what source comes the demand for this kind of legislation. Who is pressing for the passage of this particular bill? So far as I can find out, the pressure comes mostly from those who will benefit by the bill and not from many groups on the outside who represent the general public, including the taxpayers.

I know there are groups who have given their support to this bill. They think it is a civil-service measure; but those same groups also gave their support to H. R. 2700—that provided for fair, open, competitive examinations.

Mr. Chairman, you have waited about 6 years, and now, all at once, you have made a determined drive to put this legislation through. About 2 years ago the President of the United States appointed a committee known as the Commission for Civil Service Improvement. On that committee are such distinguished persons as Justice Stanley Reed—he is chairman; Justice Felix Frankfurter, William H. McReynolds, Leonard D. White, and Gen. Robert E. Wood. They were advised and directed to study the entire problem. That committee has not reported. They have given it a lot of careful study. I am informed it will be some weeks before their report will be available. Would it not be consistent for us to at least wait a few more weeks and have the benefit of their experience—the investigation and findings of this committee?

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the sponsors of this bill, or any one of you who vote for it, can justify your action in asking the people of this country to accept this legislation. It is undemocratic and manifestly unfair. It is in direct opposition, I believe, to a fair, efficient civil-service system. I have profound respect for our distinguished chairman. Only 2 years ago he introduced a measure providing for a fair competitive civil-service system. He was for it then, and I think he is in favor of it now. I just do not see why he should take the position he does this afternoon, if he is still in favor of the best and most efficient service that can be provided for our Government.

Mr. Chairman, at the proper time I shall offer an amendment to this bill providing for open, competitive, civil-service examinations to fill these positions. I trust that in fairness to our civil-service merit system, and in fairness to the thousands of people throughout the country who are entitled to compete for these jobs, and in fairness to the taxpayers of this country who are entitled to the most efficient service obtainable, that you will support my amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is not in the best interests of the principles of the civil-service merit system. It does not promote efficiency in the affairs of government. It is undemocratic and should be defeated. I believe competitive examinations are efficient and economical in selecting qualified personnel to carry on the business of our Government. If we are going to maintain a civil-service merit system, the public is entitled to the very fullest extent to the opportunity of competing for Government positions. Mr. Chairman, we have done a lot of things in the name of emergency in the past few years. This is one more step in that direction. This is not a civil-service bill. It is lip service. It ought to be defeated.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Is it not a fact that this bill is a political spoils system, anti-civil-service merit system proposition of the rankest and most sordid kind?

Mr. REES of Kansas. The gentleman can draw his own conclusions, but it is at least a spoils system in the first place, and then we are coming in by subterfuge and making the so-called spoils system a civil-service system, so-called.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. ENGEL. Does this cover into the civil service the present temporary agencies, such as the N. Y. A., the C. C. C., and these others?

Mr. REES of Kansas. They are all in there. I think they are going to take out the W. P. A. after a while.

Mr. ENGEL. Will this not be the first step toward making permanent those temporary agencies?

Mr. REES of Kansas. Oh, I do not know. You cannot tell. I expect a great many of them probably will be. Perhaps some of them should be or should not be, as far as that is concerned; but it is a step toward making permanent those people's jobs as against the 4,000,000 people that I have just been talking about and against the folks who are on the rolls who have passed these examinations and who are qualified. I do not think there can be any question about that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. For a brief question only.

Mr. CRAWFORD. At what time in the proceedings did a majority of the committee shift from this original bill to which the gentleman has referred, to the bill that is now before us, bringing about this great change?

Mr. REES of Kansas. Oh, I can hardly tell you. We held hearings on H. R. 2700. Then all at once we quit holding these hearings. Then, when the next session began, H. R. 960 was brought in all streamlined. The committee brought in some people from the departments and also some people who represent these organizations that were mentioned, but what I am saying is that the people out in the country do not understand what they are doing when they approve legislation like this.

Mr. CRAWFORD. They have the impression that you are dealing with the original bill?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I do not know that that is true. I think probably they know there are noncompetitive examinations, but I do not think they understand we are blanketing in this whole outfit.

Do you know it was testified in our committee that the bill as it stands, when you come to discharge these folks if they do not pass the examination, suppose they fail to get 70 percent, they are not discharged from their jobs. They stay right on. They are just not under civil service. That is all. They do not lose their jobs. They just are not under civil service. I believe the chairman of the committee has an amendment that will take them out of their jobs some way, if this bill is passed, because that is the rankest kind of injustice. You and I know that the taxpayers are entitled to a little consideration at the hands of the Congress. [Applause.] Let me say again this is not civil service. It is lip service.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I will take just a moment to say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] that failure to pass this bill will not help any of those on the list.

With reference to the question asked by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] as to why H. R. 2700 was dropped, the fact is that the President's reorganization plan came in just about that time and it provided for noncompetitive examinations. The jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission was practically taken away from it by the special committee on reorganization. That is why it was not followed up.

With reference to the employees who do not make a passing grade, the gentleman from Kansas ought to know that this bill carries an amendment adopted by the committee providing that they must be separated within 6 months after making the failure.

I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY].

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, the Government of the United States is committed to the principle of the merit system for its employees. The system was adopted at the time of the original Civil Service Act of 1883. Repeatedly since that time both of the major political parties have proclaimed by resolution and platform provision their belief in and friendship for the civil service. Public opinion throughout the United States predominates in favor of the merit system over the spoils system.

Fifty-seven years after the adoption of this policy we would naturally expect to find all of the civil employees of the Government under the provisions of the system. On the contrary, the record reveals that at this time, of approximately 861,000 employees, but approximately 582,000 are in civil service, and the remainder, approximately 279,000, are not under civil service. We should not be interested in the reason for this condition. Rather should we attempt to remedy it. I am frank to say that I do not approve of the policy which organized all of these bureaus and functions of government without reference to the requirements of civil-service laws and regulations. They should have been organized under civil service, and, I am sure, they could have been. Nevertheless, they were not. The proper thing to do now is place them under civil service in the most practical manner available.

Some might suggest that competitive examinations be held and all of the positions filled from the registers thus established. There are three major objections to that procedure, and each of them renders it impractical. In the first place, such procedure would completely upset each of the organizations and most likely would require the reorganization thereof with entirely new staffs, resulting in a period of readjustment and inefficiency. Further, the giving of these examinations would prove to be a task overtaxing the Civil Service Commission and entailing an enormous expenditure of money. And, finally, would disregard the rights of those employees now in the service of these agencies who have rendered and are now rendering valuable and efficient service.

The only practical solution of the question is the one provided in this bill. That is, render it possible for these employees to be covered into civil service by Executive order. This is no new procedure. It has been resorted to on many occasions by Presidents of both parties. The record shows that since the adoption of the Civil Service Act of 1883, 120,912 Government employees have been blanketed into civil service by Executive order of Republican Presidents, while less than half that number, or 55,509, have been brought in by the order of Democratic Presidents. Hence we see that this bill constitutes no new departure, but carries out a policy established by both political parties. This bill—H. R. 960—requires a protection not generally provided in placing employees in civil service. That is, each employee will be subjected to a noncompetitive examination, and any employee failing to pass that examination must be discharged within 6 months.

This is the first title of this bill. To my mind that provision is of vital importance. Of still more importance is the second title of the bill; that is, the portion of the bill which extends the Classification Act of 1923 to the field service of the Government. The passage of that act was occasioned by the necessity for such provisions in the public service. The same principle has been reiterated on several occasions since that time by the passage of classification acts for individual services. This is notably true in the case of the Postal Service and inspectors of the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

All who have given attention to the problems of the Government employee agree that the policy of the Government must be to pay its employees the same pay scale for doing the same kind of work, regardless of where the positions are located and regardless of the name by which the positions are called in various departments. This principle is recognized and enforced by the classification act and by the special acts covering individual services and likewise by those agencies which adhere to the classifications of the act. This has been found to be a satisfactory policy. It operates with justice to the employees. It increases the morale and efficiency of the employees.

Classification under the act of 1923 is restricted to the District of Columbia and does not apply in the field. I submit that its provisions are more important in the field than in the departmental service. In the departments in Washington the employees are in closer touch with the officials in charge of the agencies. It is easier to supervise and manage their duties and responsibilities. These employees are within easy reach of the Classification Division of the Civil Service Commission and near the entire commission and its personnel. Adjustments in duties and pay are much easier in Washington.

In the field frequently the employees are segregated into small offices far from the centers of activity of the agencies of which they form a part. Control and supervision of their duties is much more difficult. The responsible head of the bureaus and agencies must rely completely upon those in charge in the field. Misassignment of employees, injustices, and inequalities are much more difficult to apprehend. Therefore, every reason which prompted the Congress to extend the benefits of classification to the departmental service applies with more force to the field service.

A rank injustice exists in those agencies in which an attempt is made to vary wage scales by resort to some bureau chief's idea of the cost of living in various communities. This has resulted in ridiculous conditions. Communities having approximately the same climatic conditions and living conditions as others are classified as greatly in excess of the cost of living in that other. In some offices within the same department and bureau of the Government we find beginners drawing higher salaries than section heads and foremen in other offices of the same bureau. When an employee is transferred from one of the lower paid offices he is required to take a reduction in his grade so as to bring his grade down to the salary previously received. Again, men have been transferred from a higher paid office to a lower paid one and found themselves drawing a great deal more money than the boss of the section to which they were transferred. All of this leads to discontent, lowering of morale, loss of the better employees, and finally to inefficiency. In the interest of the Government itself this feature of the bill should be adopted.

There is no more loyal, intelligent, efficient, or hard-working body of employees in the world than the Federal employee. I bespeak for him justice in his relations with his employer. Pass this bill and make it possible for him to secure the benefits of efficiency, seniority, and faithful service.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, we have often heard it said that the comparative inefficiency in a democracy is the price we pay for our liberty and freedom. While true, those words present a constant challenge to those who are interested in the preservation of free government. In my opinion, there is nothing which impedes the efficiency of government or obstructs orderly processes more than the pernicious spoils system. We all know that under this system inefficiency and burdensome expense have crept into our Government in geometric progression in recent years.

It has reached the point where it is malodorous to the people of this country, and those of you who have followed the recent polls of public opinion know that the overwhelming sentiment is in favor of a strong, efficient civil service.

I believe that patronage is a curse to the Members of this House. In the first place, it divides our attention at a time when our efforts should be devoted to those perplexing problems which confront us. We are laggard in our duty when we take time out from our daily work to go jobseeking in return for political favor rendered by some individual. It will be a happy day for the Members of this House, as well as for the people of this Nation, when we can devote our entire time to statesmanship instead of acting the part of glorified employment agents as many of us are forced to be under the present system. No political party about which I have ever read or heard has perpetuated itself on the strength of patronage alone. We know from the experience of the past that the best way to serve our party is to serve the people of this country. This can best be done by inaugurating and instituting a strong civil service and eliminating the spoils system. Our people today are sick of seeing appointments made on the basis of political prestige or on the basis of the vote-getting ability of the applicant rather than qualifications for the job itself.

The question for us to decide today is not whether this bill is 100-percent perfect or whether it is entirely satisfactory to us personally. Obviously this is not the case. No bill of this kind will ever be 100-percent satisfactory to each individual Member of this House. I believe the question we must honestly ask ourselves is, Does the Ramspeck bill now under consideration offer some improvement over existing conditions? Will it improve the civil service? Will it strengthen the merit system in government? An honest perusal of its provisions seems to indicate that it will in every respect. It is an improvement over existing conditions—maybe not perfect in every respect, but certainly preferable to what we now have. I submit that Members on both sides of this aisle are pledged to support civil-service reform. Those who ran on the platform of their respective parties in 1936 and in 1938 pledged civil-service reform to their constituents, and only those who openly opposed that plank in their platforms have the right to oppose this measure.

This measure has the support of large groups interested in civil-service reform and also enjoys the approval of the Civil Service Commission itself. The Civil Service Commission is a bipartisan body. We must make our decision this afternoon regardless of the merits of a competitive or noncompetitive examination. I favor a competitive, and a highly competitive, examination for these important offices.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Under existing circumstances, however, it seems to me that the delay the dislocation and the expense involved warrant our accepting the non-competitive-examination feature of this bill. Certainly acceptance of the noncompetitive feature is preferable to scuttling the bill altogether. To show that the noncompetitive features have been carried out effectively in recent months let me state that under the first reorganization bill and the President's Executive order of June 24, 1938, 18 percent of those examined have been rejected; 2,300 out of 12,500 employees who have been examined have been rejected. This indicates to me that an honest effort to obtain Government employees of greater efficiency and ability is being exercised by the Civil Service Commission under the noncompetitive system; and I sincerely hope that the Members of this House will pass this bill this afternoon. [Applause.]

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I have personally regretted very greatly that this bill should come up at the present time for this very simple reason: For 2 years I have been discussing with the chairman of this Civil Service Committee, at intervals, the possibility, if not the advisability, of getting a new idea into the civil service of this country. Let me point out to you that most of the positions under civil service are purely clerical.

Many of the positions under civil service are purely clerical. There is no question about that. Most of them become strictly routine. I think it is the experience of every man who has studied the subject that a routine position wears people out more quickly than any other kind. I see no reason why we should not give greater opportunity, especially to the young people of this country than I feel civil service gives them at the present time. What I would do is this: When a young man or young woman passes a civil-service examination let him or her be appointed for 5 years only. If during this 5-year period he or she shows especial usefulness or ability, let him or her serve for another period.

If they do not show special ability let them go back home where they ought to go, marry, raise their families, and become a part of the American people. I do not want to encourage the mistake that I think is made here so often, that is, that many of the fine women who come into the civil service, remain and grow old in it, because it is a sure thing; because it provides against poverty with absolute certainty; no fear of starvation nor want to the very end of life. Because many of them feel obliged to send money home to their families, they therefore deny themselves the opportunity of marriage, and the opportunity to raise their own families. I see them here constantly in these departments. Many of them ought to be home attending to and enjoying their grandchildren. Most of them would be much happier and much better off. They not only have a perfect right to be doing that but they have the duty to do so.

Mr. Chairman, at the next session of the Congress, if I come back here, I am going to present a bill providing for this 5-year limit on civil-service employees for the consideration of the Congress. I shall point out to you some of the things it will serve. First, during the first 5-year period here the ambitious ones, the worthwhile ones would go through some college and get a degree; then go back home and be much more useful citizens than they can be without the 5 years' experience here. If they show that they are especially fitted for administrative positions or for some special work, give them another period, and when they have demonstrated the unusual ability for the higher work then and then only make their appointment permanent. By that means we can get those who are best fitted for administrative work and those who are best fitted for work along special lines, for the very best service, and at the same time send back into every locality in America from 10,000 to 50,000 young people every year with college degrees, who will be of great benefit to this country.

It will also give their neighbors an opportunity of communicating with them. It will make them leaders back home. I do not know of any other thing that would be better for this country. If the high-school boys and girls were shown that every year 10,000 of them would have a chance at 5 years in Washington, it would create a glorified revolution in American education.

And since much of the work in civil service is clerical, these young men and young women would in a month's time be doing as good work and more of it than those who had been there 20 years.

No one has any inherent right to a Government job. And no one has any right to hold a Government job unless he has earned it by superior service. There are no lifetime jobs provided for in the Constitution except for men who have shown their superior qualification, character, and special ability to judge between their fellow men—the Federal judges. Let us leave the gate to the most acceptable opportunity wide open. I repeat, I am going to present this bill at the next session of the Congress, if I am back here. I ask the Members today to think it over. I am also going to ask the Civil Service Commission to work with me, so that we may learn what proportion of these jobs are largely clerical and what proportion are not. I want to find out where we can gain something, because unless we gain something by giving lifetime jobs we have no right to give lifetime jobs. I am against lifetime jobs except as the Constitution provides, and I think we ought to recognize that, especially in this great civil service of ours. Personally, I am for the merit system, but for a merit system that gives the very greatest opportunity to the young people of this country to serve their country to the best possible advantage.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to know, does this bill cover the Congressional Library? If it does not, will the gentleman support an amendment to that effect?

Mr. KELLER. I understand it does.

Mr. HOUSTON. It covers the Congressional Library?

Mr. KELLER. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman is in favor of the merit system and we appreciate his vote for the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, although I come from one of the great cities of the United States, St. Louis, ever since the day I entered this body I have been in favor of extending the merit system. I have always advocated the promotion of career employees, even to the highest posts in the various departments and agencies. I have thought Presidents of the United States could inspire the judiciary if, when vacancies occurred, they would have appointed to our courts of appeals, United States district judges who have shown by their service they were entitled to recognition. I have likewise felt that Presidents would be inspiring the judges in our various courts of appeals if now and then one would be appointed to the highest court in the land, the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I have not been entirely satisfied with the administration of our civil-service laws. I have not been pleased with the present administration and I have not been satisfied with past administrations. I have complained, and I complain now, that the requirements making one eligible for examination deny to the practical man and woman the same opportunity that is given the college graduate. I say that a college education should not be required of a man or woman to hold a Government position if otherwise qualified. Practical men and women have proven time and again to be more efficient than those who have been fortunate enough to graduate from colleges.

I have complained about the age limit and on numerous occasions I have succeeded in having the age limit changed on an examination even after it had been announced. Only 3 weeks ago I had an age limit changed in connection with a position of garage man in the Post Office Department.

The first time I was asked to make a recommendation for a major appointment, I was requested by a Republican Postmaster General about 12 years ago, to make a recommendation for postmaster of the city of St. Louis, a $10,000 position. I recommended a man long employed in the Postal Service, and while I know my recommendation alone did not result in his appointment I am very happy to say he did get the position and he was postmaster of the city of St. Louis until he reached the age of retirement, one of the best that the city ever had.

I cannot bring myself to the point where I feel excellent laws passed by the Congress are going to be a success unless properly administered. It is needless for me to tell you of the criticism levied against the administration of some of our laws in recent months. That can and will be corrected by efficient personnel.

Had the civil service covered appointments to some of these agencies, it is my firm belief there would have been less criticism.

You will find many people in the classified service who have charge of the administration of laws that we pass who bring credit upon you by the manner they administer those laws.

Reference was made to deputy collectors of internal revenue. I can remember as far back as 1916 when efforts were advanced to put those employees under civil service. The argument was made then they were under bond to the collector and not under bond to the Government. It is mighty easy to change that and provide that they shall be under bond to the Government instead of to the collector. They belong in the classified service and will be classified under this bill. Men and women cannot understand our income-tax laws overnight. They must be thoroughly schooled.

In my city, St. Louis, there are Republicans as well as Democrats not in the civil service who have worked in the collector's office for years, no matter what party was in power. Why? Because of their efficiency and knowledge of the revenue laws. It was absolutely necessary to retain them. They have no rights under the retirement laws, and they work alongside civil-service employees who have. The same applies throughout the country. Seldom is a new collector sufficiently informed of the duties to enable him to run the office without assistance. He must rely on the old and efficient men who break in the new deputy collectors when there is a change of administration. The businessman who calls at the office to make out his return is entitled to the service of one thoroughly advised of income-tax laws. These employees should long since been given a civil-service status.

A noncompetitive examination does not mean that every employee is going to pass. I have known many times where an old employee has not been able to pass the noncompetitive examination. There is an opportunity here to weed out inefficient employees who would otherwise be retained on the pay roll through influence.

Ask yourself how many non-civil-service positions you have secured. Take an inventory. Then find out how many have been appointed by officials and those not in Congress, or in an official position. You will find for every one a Member of Congress appoints there will be four who will get their place without your aid. If they are all under civil service, then your constituent and mine will have equal opportunity, and the Government will secure more efficient help.

The administration, as well as you and I, will get the credit when laws are efficiently administered. Do not be deceived, the spoils system is going, the people demand it, and if we set the example here the States and cities will follow. Patronage has defeated many an able Member of Congress. It has been a thorn in your side, and will continue to be until eliminated.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. There is one other matter I want to speak about, and I know all are aware it has been in my mind for a long time, as I have talked about it so often; that is the so-called family affair in Government positions. I was the author of the married-woman clause in the Economy Act, which unfortunately was repealed. Some day it will go back on the statute books. I do not believe in a married woman working when her husband can and does earn a living sufficient to support the family. I honestly believe we have one job for almost every family in the United States today if the jobs are properly spread. If businessmen and Government, city, State, and Federal officials, would discontinue appointing relatives to office, you would find that you would have a position for almost every family in this country. You are not going to have happiness in this country when you have four or five people in one family on one side of the street employed and on the other side of the street a man with four or five little children and no one in the family employed.

Those conditions must be adjusted. Business itself is going to help meet them, because until you put the unemployed to work in this country, businessmen, the people who are best able to pay, are going to pay the bill so long as the Government comes to the aid of the unemployed. The sooner the businessmen and the public officials spread the jobs among families instead of putting relatives to work the better conditions will be, and when they do that the cost of government will decrease gradually. In Washington you have hundreds and hundreds of cases where husband and wife are working for the Government and thousands where several in the same family living under the same roof are employed by the Government. When reductions must come, as they will, they should go first.

I hope this bill passes, and by a large majority. If it does, there will be something for the youth of the country to look forward to. As vacancies occur they will be filled from civil-service registers when necessary.

I further express the hope that the Civil Service Commission, in administering the law, will give the practical man and woman the same opportunity to gain a position with this Government as the college graduate. [Applause.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS].

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I believe that in the discussion of this bill probably many of those who are speaking, both for and against the bill, are talking about the same thing by a different name. Insofar as I am concerned, if the operation of the present civil-service law under the Civil Service Commission meant the carrying on of a merit system, I would be for it; but I submit that the operation of the present civil-service law is not a merit system, because I know that if it were a merit system there would not be literally thousands of Government employees working in agencies throughout the Government who are not worth the salaries they are drawing.

I say to you, and I submit in all fairness, that you cannot maintain a merit system unless you have some means by which you can test the efficiency of the people who are holding the particular jobs. Under the present operation of the civil service a man or woman is given an examination, either competitive or noncompetitive, before he is given employment, and then he is forgotten for all practical purposes, the provisions of the law to the contrary notwithstanding. I am talking about the operation. Nothing ever happens after that time to test the efficiency of that man or that woman. There is never any other examination, never any test given him to determine whether he is as well equipped to handle the job 15 years from the time he was appointed or not. Until that is done it is not a merit system, and calling it a merit system will not make it that.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. Very briefly.

Mr. COX. Will the gentlewoman from Massachusetts yield more time to the gentleman so he may answer a question for me?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. COX. I am very glad the gentleman has taken the floor against this bill because I think it is thoroughly bad. I am glad he has taken the floor because I would not like to see party lines drawn on the measure. I expect to vote against the bill, and I want to feel that I am voting with the people of America, against whose interests the bill operates, rather than with the Republican Party. I want to join the gentleman in his condemnation of the Civil Service as it is operated. It is a racket, and every Member of this Congress knows in his heart that that is just exactly what it is.

Mr. NICHOLS. I thank the gentleman; and I want to say along that line, insofar as the politics of this thing is concerned, that if it were purely a political consideration I would be voting for the bill. Resolutions have been passed against me by civil-service organizations up and down the length and breadth of this country. There is no selfish political consideration in this thing for me. I am interested in the Government and the best interests of those who support it.

Civil service is not handled fairly, anyway. Every State has a quota, and the great Civil Service Commission, as is its wont to do on many things, pays absolutely no attention to the State quotas. Eleven States in the United States and the District of Columbia are far over their quotas. Does the Civil Service Commission stop appointing people from those States and the District of Columbia until other quotas are met? No. They go glibly on their way.

Let me read you some figures. The District of Columbia has a quota of 197. How many civil-service employees do you suppose there are now on the pay roll from the District of Columbia? Eight thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven, and the quota is 197 under the operation of the great Civil Service Commission which is so often held up to me as being more holy than thou.

Let us go a little further. Maryland, with a quota of 659, has 2,065 employees under civil service—this great holier-than-thou Civil Service Commission which can do no evil.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Oklahoma 2 additional minutes.

Mr. NICHOLS. When we get back into the House, I am going to ask unanimous consent to insert this table in the RECORD.

NOTE.—Number of employes occupying apportioned positions who are excluded from the apportionment figures under section 3, rule VII, and the Attorney General's Opinion of August 25, 1934, 16,078.

You will find there are only 11 States which are over their quota, and all the rest of them are under their quota. Gentlemen from Ohio may be interested to know that their State has a quota of 2,686, but there are employed only 1,631 persons from that State; and so on right down the line.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for just one second?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield.

Mr. COX. Will not the gentleman sponsor an amendment to the bill to the effect that it shall not go into effect until the quota provision of the law is complied with?

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman from Oklahoma would certainly support such an amendment, and I would hope that some man with greater influence than I might sponsor it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman give me some more time?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I have no time available, but I yielded to the gentleman yesterday, and I know the gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman knows I want to be fair, but will he not yield me a minute if he is going to ask me a question? I yield for a question.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I just want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the time from January 30, 1937, to February 28, 1939, the number of employees from the District of Columbia was reduced over 200.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman has an hour; why does he not use his own time to do that? I have only 2 minutes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I wanted the gentleman to know the facts about that.

Mr. NICHOLS. I was very much interested in the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH], who points out that one good that can flow from the extension of the civil service under this bill is that it will cure gastric ulcers and hiccoughs. [Laughter.]

That is one of the finest arguments I have heard for the passage of this bill, and if you think that hiccoughs are caused by diet in the lower strata of life rather than the idea that I have always labored under that for the most part they were caused from excessive participation in spirit fermenti, probably that is a good reason to support the bill. [Laughter and applause.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. NICHOLS. On yesterday my distinguished friend from Georgia, the able chairman of this committee, took Mr. J. Edgar Hoover to task because Mr. Hoover had dared to suggest that there was a better way of selecting employees for his department, in his judgment, than through the process of civil service, and then he said that it was a dastardly thing—so said my friend from Georgia—that Hoover would now point out that the Civil Service had sent him one person to be employed who was later adjudged to be demented, and he said it was a cowardly thing for Mr. Hoover to point out that the Civil Service had sent him two other employees whom he could not use at all, one of them having been convicted, I think, of communism or something, and the other having been convicted of some other infraction of the law.

I submit to you in all fairness that this bill should be by you defeated. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAY].

Mr. FAY. Mr. Chairman, I voted in favor of the rule to bring this bill before the Committee. I am going to vote for the bill today.

For 4 years prior to my assuming office in Congress I was chief field deputy of the third district of New York city—the largest internal-revenue district in our country. I had under my supervision over 200 men and women as deputy collectors. I saw the type of work they performed. They have given fine service—so much so that the record of production has increased over 100 percent from 1932 until today. They have made this work their career, and I urge upon the Members of the House, as a further incentive to them to do greater work for our country, to adopt this bill and pass it today. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I want to take just a moment to call attention to the fact that under the quota tables as shown on June 30, 1937, as compared with those on February 28, 1939, which is a little less than 2 years, the State of Oklahoma, whence the gentleman who recently spoke comes, increased its number of employees by 196, while the District of Columbia, under the operation of that same law, lost 234 employees, which indicates that the Commission is enforcing the quota law to the advantage of the gentleman's own State.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a second?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I am sorry I cannot yield now. I yielded to the gentleman.

Mr. NICHOLS. I just want to point out that I was talking about the report of 1940.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not yield to the gentleman further.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOSER].

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Chairman, much as I dislike to talk partisan politics in the House of Representatives, I will preface my remarks by saying that my Democratic background cannot be challenged by anybody. When I was a rather young man, W. D. Jamieson, a former Member of this House, asked me to assist him by preparing something on the subject of civil service, to be used in the campaign of 1912. I prepared for him a statement and compilation from a history of the United States by James Schouler and carried forward by Julian Hawthorne, giving full credit to the administration of Grover Cleveland for the establishment of the civil service. It has been my pride to point to that rather frequently as time has gone on, as a progressive accomplishment of the Democratic Party. I cleave to that act as I decry its circumvention and scuttling.

I want to say something now with reference to apportionment. I do not know of anyone who has been a more ardent advocate of adherence to the apportionment law or who has been more zealous in his discussion and support of it than the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Civil Service, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK]. He is equally familiar with the fact that Mr. Vipond testified that with the enactment of this legislation, automatically the people who are now in the Federal service, if they are blanketed into the classified civil service and given noncompetitive examinations, will be frozen into their positions, irrespective of the quotas of the different States. Thus the District of Columbia, with 47 times its quota, 8,759 positions; Maryland, with 3 times its quota, 1,884 positions; Virginia, with 2 times its quota, 1,940 positions, may be contrasted to California, with one-third its quota, 777 positions occupied.

That is the testimony before the committee, and that is exactly what will happen.

The chairman of the committee a while ago, having talked with the Civil Service Commission, made reference to the remark I made yesterday, and much to my satisfaction said that the Civil Service Commission proposed to make further investigation into the qualifications with respect to business training and experience of the person to whom I alluded yesterday as one representing every communistic front organization in my district, being interested in the petitions and resolutions which were referred in the House of Representatives to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I am happy to learn that. I personally took this up with the Civil Service Commission and was informed the correspondence investigation disclosed four of six responses attested to the communistic activities and associations of this applicant for appointment as postmaster. Letters attesting to this have been written to me by indignant constituents. Letters were also written to the Post Office Department, and that Department asked me recently about my position, having previously apprised me of the adamant position of the Commission declining a recertification. I told them that I would stand fast in my position despite the Civil Service Commission's determination this applicant's name must remain in the original position on the roster.

Another instance of the Commission's adamant and unjustifiable position involves the certification of three, one of whom is definitely proven to avoid payment of just debts to municipal government, though already in the classified civil service and previously under morality charges resulting in dismissal from a prior public-service position, and yet another in previous public service but culpable of concealment or immorality involving adultery on the part of one, and fornication on the part of a second classified employee, both of whom were dismissed. This manifest prejudice to eligibility, on being presented to the Commission, brought an expression of hope no personal investigation had been made. A review brought the assertion that these matters had been considered in the ratings. Another angle of contract, the assertion of initial attention being directed thereto, and a final report that everything was considered in original determination of eligibility. Regardless of who presents what evidence of error, the autocratic bureaucracy within the Commission will permit of no correction on the part of those employees whose integrity can no more be challenged than questioned.

As a former post-office inspector, I have first-hand knowledge of character investigations jointly made by post-office inspectors and representatives of the Commission. The arrogance and adamant position of the bureaucratic Civil Service Commission has stopped these investigations, and I personally know the uncomfortable and insecure feeling on the part of classified employees of the Post Office Department. There are those who know that I know what they know they once did by way of public duty, but are now cowed and timid, shunning admissions or freedom of expression, while policy-creating posts have occupants attesting to the browbeating and domination of the Department by the Commission, as evidenced in the case of a recommendation by our late lamented colleague from Ohio, Mr. Ashbrook, involving a postmaster appointed at Nankin, Ohio.

President Mitchell has been press-quoted that he would have the Comptroller General stop payment of this postmaster's salary. On learning the postmaster pays himself his own salary from receipts of the post office, his next approach was to have the Comptroller General withhold approval of the accounts rendered by the postmaster. Blocked again in an overzealousness to make someone cringe, latest advices today, from within the Post Office Department, is that President Mitchell, smarting under his successive rebuffs, is now determined to have the case thrashed out in court.

Verily, bureaucracy cannot err and confesses no error.

Exampling the Commission's smarting under criticism is the statement published in the Washington Post this morning, and broadcast over the radio last evening, manifestly as a result of the debate under the rule in this House yesterday afternoon. As J. Edgar Hoover's position toward the Civil Service Commission was both extolled and condemned on the floor of the House yesterday, the Civil Service Commission has seen fit to give out an attack on Mr. Hoover and the position he has taken, without identifying the individual issuing it.

I have here Mr. Hoover's answer to the Commission, which, with the indulgence of the Committee, I shall read:

> In resisting efforts to place the Federal Bureau of Investigation under civil service I have been motivated solely by the desire to maintain the Bureau upon the highest plane of efficiency and accomplishments. The method of selecting personnel employed in the Bureau and the merit system which it has developed are demonstrably superior to the civil-service system and I do not want the Bureau bogged down with misfits and incompetents or by persons possessing communistic beliefs.
> Since 1924 the only persons in the F. B. I. under civil service have been technical employees in fingerprint work. The difficulties experienced through selecting such personnel under civil service rules have been costly and have produced results reflecting inefficiency. I have contended that until and unless the Civil Service Commission can provide a system applicable to the F. B. I. which is at least as good as we now have, I would be recreant to the trust imposed upon me if I did not protest to the utmost of my ability against the red tape, cumbersome and inept methods of appointment which have been clearly shown in the Bureau's experience with the Civil Service Commission.
> It should be clearly understood that it is not the principle of civil service nor the statutes provided for the control and extension of this principle by Congress to which I object in any manner. I am strongly in favor of the civil-service principle and its extension wherever and whenever possible. I have objected, and do still object, however, to the inefficient and utterly inadequate administration of the civil-service statutes which have been manifested so clearly in the functioning of the Civil Service Commission, at least so far as its contacts with this Bureau are concerned.
> It is correct that the F. B. I. is not willing to accept civil-service eligibles on the basis of character investigations conducted by the Commission. The reason is that the investigative staff of the Commission is not conversant with this Bureau's problems and definitely could not provide employees of the type secured by the Bureau itself.

In a letter dated June 7, 1938, I advised the Commission that the Bureau intended to conduct its own character investigation of eligibles, but that I did not desire to request that the civil-service investigations be not made, since this was a matter which the Civil Service Commission should pass upon. In the same letter a statement was made that the F. B. I. would be pleased to receive any information concerning the character of any eligibles certified for appointment which might have come to the attention of the Commission. At no time has the Civil Service Commission seen fit to furnish to the F. B. I. any reports of investigations which may have been made by the Commission.

The statement made by the Commission that it sometimes reinvestigates cases already investigated by the F. B. I. is apparently contradictory to its statement that if the F. B. I. "had not been in a position to investigate these persons who were to work in a law-enforcement agency, the Commission would have done so * * *."

With regard to the reference made by the Civil Service Commission to the effect that if the F. B. I. had not investigated its applicants the Civil Service Commission would have done so and therefore there would have been no duplication and additional cost, I desire to emphasize the fact that the reason the F. B. I. insisted upon conducting its own investigations was because I was definitely of the opinion that the Civil Service Commission was unable to properly perform this task. This opinion was based upon the unfitness displayed by the Commission in providing us with inferior personnel.

According to a press statement in January 1940 Civil Service Commissioner Arthur S. Flemming publicly stated, "We haven't been able to do as much as we should on character investigation. This would save money for the public by doing away with later costs of eliminating undesirables in the service * * *." This would appear to be a very significant admission on the part of the Civil Service Commission that it is unable to properly investigate applicants for law-enforcement agencies. Presumably law-enforcement agencies, under this statement, would have to appoint persons with undesirable records because of the inability of the Civil Service Commission to make character investigations.

The records of the F. B. I. show that during the period from January 1936 to November 1939 5,109 names of student fingerprint classifier eligibles were certified for appointment by the Commission. Of these, only 363 were found to be suitable. It is conservatively estimated that the cost of these F. B. I. investigations of applicants is not less than $100 per applicant. On the basis that it is necessary to investigate practically all eligibles certified, it will be seen that the cost to the Bureau is tremendous. It should be noted that under the appointive system of the F. B. I. a large percentage of these eligibles would never have been investigated and, consequently, there was an absolute waste of Government money on the part of the F. B. I. in being forced to give detailed attention to the eligibles who were not appointed.

Another difficulty which has been experienced by the F. B. I. in connection with filling technical fingerprint positions has been in securing names of eligibles from the Commission. Indicative of the delays experienced in securing such eligibles, the records show that a request was made for a student fingerprint classifier register on August 17, 1937, and the first eligibles were not certified to the F. B. I. until August 25, 1938, over 1 year later.

The statement has been made to the effect that "The principal difference between Mr. Hoover and the Civil Service Commission is that Mr. Hoover wants to operate his civil service personally and without regard to the democratic principles of (A) open competition and (B) equal opportunity." This statement is false. I know of nothing more democratic and I know of no more competition so sweepingly comprehensive as that afforded by the F. B. I. to applicants for appointment. The applicants come from every section of the country, they are afforded the most rigid tests, and appointments are made on a basis of efficiency solely.

The Commission states that "The American system of open competition could and would select persons of the highest character and fitness for Mr. Hoover's bureau, just as it has for such agencies * * *." The American system of open competition would doubtless, if properly administered, be able to bring this about. However, the Civil Service Commission has utterly failed over a period of years in applying its selection methods to one section of the F. B. I.

With regard to the policy of the F. B. I. in the matter of its refusal to appoint persons with communistic views, I desire to admit the truth of any charge of this kind that may be made. These individuals do not belong in the ranks of the F. B. I. or any other law-enforcement agency. It is noted that the Civil Service Commission does lip service to this ideal.

The Civil Service Commission is apparently bound by certain technical requirements which necessitate that it be definitely proven that an appointee be a member of the Communist Party or that some such technical disqualification be found. The investigation made by the F. B. I. is of such a character to establish beyond a shadow of a doubt the known attitude and statements of these individuals, and action is taken in accordance.

With regard to the statement of the Civil Service Commission to the effect that the F. B. I. refuses to open its personnel files on former employees to C. S. C. investigators, the facts are that in such instances full and complete information is made available to the Civil Service Commission. However, the files are not turned over to the Commission for the reason that they contain much information which has been furnished to the F. B. I. in strict confidence and it is the desire of the F. B. I. to maintain in confidence not the information itself but the identity of those furnishing it.

The controversy between the F. B. I. and the Civil Service Commission is not one between arbitrary power and democracy, but it is the ancient battle between red tape and efficiency.

I leave it to the perspicacity of the Members of the House of Representatives to determine the contrast between the attitude toward the Federal Bureau of Investigation by the Commission, where all but one class of employees are outside the classified civil service, and the Post Office Department, where all are within the classified civil service except policy-making heads. Mr. Hoover and his agents are free to exercise their constitutional right to freedom of speech, but classified employees are muzzled to a degree of resentment, to which I can attest from experience.

The enactment of this bill will only spread the extent of the empire, wherein the monarch and his court cannot err, and never admit error.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RUTHERFORD].

Mr. RUTHERFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill. I have always been in favor of an honest and fair competitive system of examinations for those who desire to enter the Government service and am in favor of some system of examinations, from time to time, for those who have entered the service, in order to maintain proper efficiency. However, the bill under consideration is not conducive to the improvement of our civil service, and I am opposed to it and will vote against it. This bill proposes to blanket into the civil service some 300,000 politically appointed persons. Persons who have obtained their jobs not because of any special ability, but because they had friends in Washington who were able to secure positions for them. Is it a fair thing to give these political appointees a preferred status? What about the other 800,000 persons in the United States who have already taken and passed their civil-service examinations and are now eligible for Government employment and who are still unemployed? What are the Members of Congress who vote for this bill going to say to those already eligible? To my mind it is certainly most unfair treatment. It seems to me that the least that could be done by the committee in charge of this bill is to propose a committee amendment which would provide for a real competitive examination. The argument against such a proposition seems to be that not more than 30 percent of the politically appointed persons intended to be blanketed in by this bill could pass such an examination. If that be so it is all the more reason why real competitive examinations should be held. If we are going to have civil service for Government employment, let us have a real merit system, not a make-believe such as this bill provides. Every friend of the merit system should vote against this bill, and then the committee could bring in one which provides for a competitive civil-service merit system. I am not in favor of giving political employees a life job, so, as I stated before, I will vote against this bill.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I take these 3 minutes to acquire information from the chairman of the committee, if I can have his attention. I refer to the veterans' preference in the Civil Service Act. I have several letters from veterans who are on the civil-service list, and have been for years, and they are repeatedly urging that they are fast approaching an age when they cannot be employed. If this bill is passed, what will be the situation with respect to the veterans' preference? Suppose this bill passes and it covers into the civil service 300,000 positions which are now occupied and those people are frozen into their positions, what about the people having veterans' preference?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I would say that it is estimated that about 25 percent of these people would be disqualified on a noncompetitive examination, and the veterans would then have preference in appointment to those vacant positions, if they are on the eligible list. If this bill does not pass, they have not a chance to get any of these jobs.

Mr. MILLER. Will those on the eligible list at the present time be considered for appointment, as replacements?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; wherever the Commission has an eligible list suitable for the position which may be vacant.

Mr. MILLER. There is one other question. In title II of the bill, page 11, I ask the gentleman to qualify for us the following sentence:

Nor shall anything in this act be construed to prevent the application of the existing veterans' preference provisions in civil-service laws, Executive orders, and rulings.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Title II deals with the Classification Act and has nothing to do with title I. It extends the Civil Service Act. It protects the veterans' preference in the application of the classified salaries.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. If all of these people are blanketed in, the veterans will have no preference. These examinations are noncompetitive.

Mr. RAMSPECK. And may I say to the gentlewoman that they will be given the same treatment that they are now receiving in competitive positions. If they qualify, of course, they will get their points as they would in any other position.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEONARD W. HALL].

Mr. LEONARD W. HALL. Mr. Chairman, the fundamental question posed by the bill under consideration is whether or not its enactment will promote the civil-service merit system. That is its declared objective, and that is the question we must test.

The proponents of this measure are advocating it on the ground that we must take this step if we are to bring the positions under the bill from out of the patronage rule. And, to fortify their position, they point to what they ascribe as precedents under former administrations.

In addition, certain organizations, some of them earnestly and sincerely devoted to extension of the civil service and the elimination of patronage control, view this proposal with favor, although with, perhaps, some misgivings. They know they will get far from perfection under this bill, but seemingly persuaded by the expediency of the situation, they are willing to compromise.

These organizations, and thousands of people throughout the country who have fought consistently for the civil service, are necessarily stanch advocates of the open competitive principle as the foundation stone of the civil-service system. And, naturally, they urge that they would like to see this open competitive principle obtain with reference to bringing into the civil service the 300,000 or more positions that are said to be covered under the Ramspeck bill. However, notwithstanding that the bill does not provide the open competitive principle, and because of the way the bill has been brought before us, some of them are willing, in order to bring these positions under the civil service, to compromise the open competitive principle and to take instead, as the next best thing, the procedure of noncompetitive examination.

This is not compromise. This is sabotage.

To bring in 300,000 patronage appointments under the civil service means that we are sabotaging the entire civil-service structure. And besides being asked to scuttle this principle, we are asked to shut our eyes to the rightful claims of millions of our people; millions who are willing and anxious to subscribe to the open competitive test, and who are desirous of taking their place in the Government, in a truly career service.

Today we have roughly 600,000 persons in the classified service. This bill would give the President authority, whenever he sees fit—there is nothing mandatory about it, mind you—to blanket in an additional 300,000 persons who will attain a classified status provided they meet two small requirements: (1) That they are recommended by the head of their particular agency; and (2) that they pass such noncompetitive test as the Civil Service Commission may prescribe. And, parenthetically, if they do not pass the first noncompetitive test, let us remember, they will be given further opportunities to try again.

Here we are asked, in one fell swoop, to extend the civil service, under the guise of advancing the merit rule, by bringing in a number of persons equalling 50 percent of the present number of classified employees. And we are asked to do this on the basis of no open competitive test and on the basis of denying millions of persons in the country at large the equal opportunity of securing these appointments. And this is the sort of compromise that we are asked to accept in the place of holding fast to the true principle underlying the merit system—the open competitive examination.

It seems to me that when we begin to compromise by violating the true principle of the civil service to the extent of 50 percent that, instead of compromising, we are really sabotaging the civil service.

We should try to remember just what factors were present which induced the growth of an army of 300,000 patronage appointments. The answer lies in the fact that this administration has refused, from the beginning of this tremendous growth in the extra civil service, to take even the most feeble step forward in advancing the merit system. In practically every case the organic law creating these agencies specifically exempted the positions from the civil service.

The record will bear out the statement that in the drafts of many of these bills there was included provision after provision specifically exempting these positions from the civil service. And where these recommendations cannot be specifically charged to the administration, nevertheless, when these bills became law there was found in them the usual provision that these positions "shall not be subject to the Classification Act of 1923"—meaning that they were earmarked purely and wholly as jobs which the political paymaster could fill.

And this practice of specifically putting these positions outside of the civil service was strenuously opposed by the Civil Service Commission, and in every case by the Republican minority in the Congress. Not once did the Civil Service Commission fail to object and to urge that the personnel covered by the acts should be taken from the civil-service rolls.

It has been argued that the emergency upon emergency decreed by Mr. Roosevelt made impracticable the filling of these positions under normal civil-service procedure. It was held out, although in a lame way, that the exigency of the times was such as to make it necessary to suspend the merit system in order that the positions might be filled promptly. In other words, the claim was made that the civil-service system, as a matter of practical administration, could not speed its register-providing machinery. The information was broadcast that it was impossible for the Commission to give the various agencies the necessary registers with the names of qualified men and women. But remember, in this connection, the consistent objection by the Civil Service Commission to the statutory exemption of these positions from the classified rule.

Against these Roosevelt emergencies, let us recollect the emergency of the World War. Certainly no one will seek to argue that we had more opportunity during the days of the World War to be leisurely in the selection of personnel. Yet the records of the Civil Service Commission will show that outside of a few inconsequential classification groups all of the personnel gathered together during those World War days for service at the seat of Government and also in the field, were certified under regular civil-service procedure and under the cardinal principle underlying the merit system—the principle of the open competitive examination. And the records of the Civil Service Commission will show that they contain expressions of commendation and congratulations from various Government departments testifying to the extraordinarily fine job done by the Commission during the World War in making available the personnel to prosecute the needs of the war in the administrative field.

Reflection on this comparison will point to the conclusion that the difference in procedure during the World War emergency and the perpetual Roosevelt emergencies has been one simply of practical politics, and nothing else.

The procedure under the Ramspeck bill, in my estimation, simply continues the sabotaging of the civil service which has been done continuously since the first day of the Roosevelt administration. This bill is now brought out in 1940, a Presidential election year. All of a sudden it is made to claim our attention as an indispensable item of legislation. But so far it has not been called emergency legislation. If it were, there would be both rhyme and reason for such a title, because it is obviously intended to meet an emergency in the fortunes of the New Deal party, which hopes, by this scheme, to hold together for its support this group of more than 300,000 persons.

As touching very directly on what previous administrations have done in the matter of so-called blanketing of positions into the civil service, I should like to call attention to an article by Mr. George D. Riley, appearing in the Washington Times-Herald of February 4, 1940, under the heading "Roosevelt blanketed as many as all (Presidents) combined since 1900." Mr. Riley, I think it is generally conceded, is one of the best-posted editors on the civil service that we have in this country. His devotion to the civil service and the merit system comes pretty nearly being fanatical. What he says will, of course, have to speak for itself.

I am not willing to leave matters as they are. I am anxious to meet this situation but in a way that will recognize the keystone of the merit system. The report of the Civil Service Committee, on page 2, says that the committee has given much consideration to the advisability of competitive examinations for these positions and that its recommendation for the noncompetitive procedure is based on testimony presented to it that if competitive examinations were to be demanded large appropriations would be required and that a disruption of service in many of the agencies would occur.

Nowhere in the report is there any break-down of the classification groups in which these 300,000 or more positions fall. For instance, we do not know how many of these people are stenographers, typists, bookkeepers, clerks, messengers, auditors, various mechanical machine operators, and so forth. Such information would, of course, be enlightening and I regret very much that the committee did not include it in its report. I think it is a fair guess that if we were to break down this total group of 300,000 that the major classifications, in number, would fall preponderantly into nonexpert groups; that the vast number would be embraced in clerical and other groups for which the Civil Service Commission has always had ample registers.

My alternative plan, and I advance it for most serious consideration, is that we hold fast to the open competitive principle and yet meet the universal desire to bring these positions into the classified service. And, as a guide to the mechanics of how such an end could be obtained, it is my suggestion that the positions under the Ramspeck bill be brought into the classified service, but that each person be required to engage in an open competitive examination, when and as the Civil Service Commission normally holds its periodic tests for comparable positions.

This procedure would wipe out all of the objections that to attempt to give open competitive examinations for these people at any one time would burden us with large expenditures of funds, and at the same time work a severe disruption in the examining machinery of the Civil Service Commission.

Under my plan, the Ramspeck group would be left alone, undisturbed; these positions would be brought under the civil service but the personnel itself would be required to participate in open competitive examinations, I repeat, when and as the Civil Service Commission holds its periodic tests for comparable positions. Especially in the lower classified lists the Civil Service Commission holds its tests at more or less frequent intervals. These tests are open to every person who meets the requirements.

The Commission must take all of the applicants who have the qualifications. There is no way by which it can reduce the application lists. The expense incurred is inelastic. It must meet whatever is made necessary. To the number applying from the country at large would simply be added those who now hold positions in the exempt group. Under this plan there would be no extra expense, no disruption of the examining machinery, and the principle of the open competitive system would be retained. Nothing has occurred in the last 6 months that makes vitally necessary the immediate examination of these exempt personnel. Under the Ramspeck bill, as drawn, no one knows when the President may bring them into the classified services, or when, after that is done, the Civil Service Commission may hold the noncompetitive examinations which are provided.

In those positions which are above clerical classifications my plan also presents no difficulties. At the present time the Civil Service Commission in conducting tests for so-called experts or specialists, does not hold assembled examinations, but rather bases its tests on qualifications and experience. Certainly it would be an easy matter—or it should be—for the experts and specialists in the present exempt group to compete favorably with the country at large. As a matter of fact, they have everything in their favor.

My plan would not scuttle, would not sabotage the merit system, and yet I believe it can easily serve as a means of accomplishing what many of us earnestly desire—the extension of the civil service and the elimination of the spoils system. It does not compromise this principle as does the Ramspeck bill, but holds to it fast, and yet provides a practical way of meeting our objective.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER].

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, under the guise of a wholly commendable civil-service extension, the Ramspeck bill is actually an effort to freeze into permanency the thousands of appointees employed by New Deal agencies.

Through the device of noncompetitive examinations, the established heads of governmental departments would be able to extend civil-service classification to those employees who have served 6 months immediately prior to the inclusion of the job within the classified service. Hundreds of Federally owned corporations whose indefinite continuation has been a vigorously contested issue, would become permanent bodies under this proposal.

There can be no doubt of the wisdom of civil service in governmental positions of established and unchallenged permanence. But the extensions contemplated in this bill are still untested. This kind of legislation reflects the growing conviction that the New Deal is on the way out. It seeks to foist upon a new administration an army of Federal employees who will attempt to carry on the program which our Nation is ready to repudiate.

To saddle a National Government with the burden of vast expenditures permanently added to the Budget by such measures as this, is to deny the will of our people. Many of these agencies were created to meet emergency needs. They were not intended to become permanent additions to the taxpayers' burden.

I urge Congress to defer the passage of this bill until such time as we have tested the wisdom of its provisions in the light of experience.

Mr. Chairman, I have received many letters from women's organizations and other organizations in support of the Ramspeck bill, but the bill they are thinking about is not the bill now under consideration. These organizations never had in mind the idea of a noncompetitive examination, or freezing 300,000 employees into the Government service without having them submit to competitive examination. If an amendment is offered to provide for competitive examinations, I will vote for such an amendment and vote for the bill when so amended.

When former Governor Davey, of Ohio, knew he was on the way out he ordered noncompetitive examinations and froze thousands of employees into the State service. When Governor Bricker came in under an economy program he found it difficult to get rid of many of these employees because they were frozen into the service.

Somehow or other, when one is on the public pay roll, and even though he is of the opposite political faith, there are those in your own party who want to keep him on the pay roll. I say to you that in the light of the remarks I made earlier today, with our Government pay roll of almost a million employees, with our economic condition as bad as it is after 7 years of New Deal experimentation, with hundreds of thousands of new employees on the pay roll, this is no time to freeze these individuals into Government service against the best judgment of the people of this country. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I expect to support this legislation not because it makes the civil service perfect. Admittedly it does not. The civil service can still stand improvement, but it does take a long step toward taking Government positions into civil service.

We all know that once they are in they will not be removed without a great deal of resistance from all those in the country who are interested in civil service. I will agree that there are valid arguments against blanketing in, but there are valid arguments for it. In any event, once it is done, those positions, which are more important than the individuals who may at any time hold them, have come under civil-service regulations and civil-service laws, and they will stay there. It is a permanent advance in the civil service.

At this time I would like to read an excerpt from a letter which I have received from one who is very much interested in the civil service and who cannot be accused of having any political interest in this argument. The excerpt follows:

> I am informed by Mr. Kaplan that the Ramspeck bill (H. R. 960) is on the calendar of the House of Representatives and will soon come up for a vote. Its adoption would be so tremendous a reform in the Government service that I feel moved to express the strong hope that you and the rest of the Connecticut Representatives will vote for it and fight for it.
> I am confident that if the bill becomes a law the President will make use of the authority given him and extend the merit system to cover a tremendous number of offices.
>
> As to the noncompetitive qualifying test, it seems to me that that is going as far as practical. The main thing is to take those offices out of politics and "freezing in" present employees will do it.

This is signed "Sincerely yours, Horace D. Taft."

That expresses, I think, a fair, nonpolitical view of the situation and of the fact that this step will bring in these offices to the permanent civil-service law and advance the civil-service principle in the country. For that reason, as well as the reason that it is in fact helpful to many who have shown efficiency already in the service, but primarily because it is an advance for the civil-service principle, I expect to support this legislation. I hope that we may all look at the facts of the matter and not political prejudice for or against it and pass this legislation.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Is the letter which the gentleman read from a brother of former President Taft?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I think everyone knows who the gentleman is. It is not a political question. I think it is a question of the advancement of the civil service.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am supporting this legislation because I believe in the merit system. The Republican Party today has said that this is nonpolitical. They are for the merit system, but not in its present form. They talk about not bringing politics into it, and what the New Deal has done about the civil service. In my State, when the Republican Party came into power, in order to get rid of a Democrat on a bipartisan board, they consolidated the board and set it up under some other title. In other words, Hitler liquidates them, but the Republican Party consolidates them to get rid of them. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Apparently there are political considerations in favor of this bill as well as against it. I do not contend that there is no political consideration whatever on the part of anyone who favors the bill. I do contend that there is political consideration among those who oppose it. I believe that regardless of politics, it is still a desirable measure, because it will bring these offices permanently under the merit system where we think they should be.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman tell me, if he were a Republican, could he vote for this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I hope I could see my way clear to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARTER].

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Chairman, the last speaker said that we want to look at the facts. I only wish I had sufficient time to look at the facts, because if you get down to the basic facts in this case you will all be convinced that the bill you should vote for here today is the one which will be offered in place of this bill, that is, H. R. 2700, which was originally offered by the chairman of the committee.

I am sure that every one of us, if we are sincere in our desire to keep away from politics, will wholeheartedly support the amendment substituting that bill when it is offered here. I do not believe there is anyone who will come into the Well of the House and say he is not in favor of the merit system. Just how sincere are we when we say we are in favor of the merit system? I say the test is whether we will vote for H. R. 2700 or H. R. 960. If we are really for the merit system, I say to the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK], that he and others on his side of the aisle, as well as those on our side of the isle, will support the bill he originally introduced. Why it did not come out of the Committee on the Civil Service at that time, and why it was not brought before this House for action, I cannot understand, because today everyone, on both sides of the aisle, and primarily on my right, get up here and urge support of the merit system. Is it merit system to come in her and blanket in 300,000 employees who received their appointments through political prestige? Is that a merit system? And have in mind, if you please, that the balance of the civil service, something over 500,000, do not look at the future complacently—those who are in the civil service through competitive examination. And may I ask what is the hope of the million who are on the eligible list through competitive examination and desire appointment? You and I know they will almost never have a chance to be appointed to any job if H. R. 960 passes.

A number of amendments will be offered which will test the sincerity of your statements and prove whether you really and truly sponsor and stand for the extension of the civil service on a merit basis. I hope that every Member who is sitting through this debate will have definitely in his mind his own statement or his colleagues' statements that they support the merit system when these amendments are offered. I, too, have received letters saying that the writers were in favor of H. R. 960. I particularly went before four Federal civil-service groups in my district and talked to them concerning this bill. Had they analyzed the bill? When they did, these four groups of civil-service people who had actually sweat through examinations, and been appointed from the eligible list as a result, opposed 960.

What is going to happen to our quotas? We hear a lot of talk about their being out of balance. If you live in a State where the quota is out of balance to your disadvantage, how will you feel when you have to go back home and tell the folks you voted to blanket these political appointees in, something which will put the quota out of balance that much more? Are you not going to be a little bit shamefaced when you go home and admit that you voted to put your quota that much more out of balance? An amendment is going to be offered which will provide that nothing contained in the bill shall be so construed to put the quota further out of balance.

If you will give your sincere attention to the reading of this bill and the amendments that are offered you will have plenty to think about, because this bill is probably one of the most important pieces of legislation that has come before this body in years affecting—and I say affecting advisedly—the merit system of our civil service. I am only sorry that the gentleman in charge of this bill, the fine chairman of our committee, could not see his way clear to ask that H. R. 2700 be reported out of the committee so that each and every one of us could have an honest test here on the floor of the House through a committee-recommended bill as to whether we truly believe in the merit system. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, every institution in human history passes through three stages. The first is the stage of inception, of beginning, when it is just an idea trying to gain acceptance in the minds of a few people. The second stage is that of establishment, when a struggle is going on actually to build the institution into the fabric of human life. The third stage is the stage of recognition, when it is taken for granted as being a part of the machinery of the way people get along together. The merit system in Government is attempting today to pass out of the second stage into the third. Until this time comes, until it is accepted as a really necessary, proper, and recognized institution of government you cannot effectively talk of improvements in the system because you will always have a conflict between those who really would destroy it if they could on the one hand and its friends upon the other. [Applause.]

Until the question of whether we shall have a merit system or not is finally settled we cannot face effectively the question of its improvement.

I submit to you in the brief moment at my command that not yet in my experience in this House have I heard extended debate of any sort on the question of what we could do to improve the civil service. Obviously it can be improved; but in my judgment one obvious trouble is that the Civil Service Commission has never had enough money given to it to give the kind of examinations for some of the Government positions which they ought to give, I mean an examination going beyond the mere writing of answers to questions. Having passed this bill all the matters of improvement of the Government service will be before us and for the first time we will be able earnestly to consider them on their merits.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, ever since I can remember I have heard the English Government held up as an ideal in providing opportunity for competent persons to enter a career in the Government service. I feel that such an ideal is one toward which we ought to be tending. Perhaps we are a long way from it, but I think that this bill now before us, H. R. 960, tends in that direction.

I, too, favor highly competitive examinations for practically all employees in the administrative branch of our Government because the public service exists not for the benefit of a public employee but rather for the purpose of serving the public. It is not our purpose in carrying on Government work to give employment but, rather, we ought to seek the very best employees to carry on this public service. For these reasons I ordinarily favor highly competitive examinations.

However, that does not mean that in this case I hesitate in regard to the provision of the bill which provides for noncompetitive examinations. I cannot see how you can throw all of these 300,000 people into a competitive examination in a limited time and arrive at any just or fair conclusion. The Civil Service Commission right now is loaded to the guards. I cannot find out how some of my constituents came out on examinations taken 6 months ago. The gentleman from California was correct when he said we have not been giving the Civil Service Commission enough money or force to carry on the great, intricate, complicated, and scientific task which we have imposed upon it.

It seems to me impossible, as well as unfair, to demand competitive examinations now of those employees in the new Federal agencies, and I think the noncompetitive examinations will serve the purpose adequately. It may be that there are incompetent individuals now in the Federal employment. I would like some check upon them, and I believe the noncompetitive examination provided for in this measure will weed out those who ought to be weeded out. Granted that we can, by this means, eliminate incompetent individuals and retain the great bulk of Federal employees who are competent, I would wish to extend the benefits of security and tenure and all other benefits of civil-service classification to those who stand the test and show that they are both able and willing to carry on Uncle Sam's work.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of the time.

Mr. Chairman, first I want to say to my friends on the Republican side, who have been so much concerned as to why H. R. 2700 was not pursued, that they well know that at about the time we completed hearings on that bill the President's reorganization plan came in. The Rules Committee created a special committee, taking jurisdiction of civil-service matters and placing it in the hands of that committee, making their legislation privileged on the floor. As a result, they brought in a bill introduced by Mr. MEAD of New York, who is now the junior Senator from that State, and his bill in substance was the same as the bill which we are considering here today.

The evidence taken before the committee in the investigation of H. R. 2700 of the Seventy-fifth Congress was almost exclusively opposed to the competitive method and while I have not the time to go into details, the testimony of Mr. Kaplan, of the Civil Service Reform League, very clearly indicates that although he believed the competitive system was the ideal system, the practical method and the one that would have to be used was the noncompetitive system.

We have heard a lot about the quota here today. The quota system does not apply to all positions in Washington. It does not apply to dismissals from the service, and during the World War it was necessary to suspend it. After the World War, the District of Columbia, as I recall it, had some 15,000 positions. It has gradually been reduced over the years, and is gradually being reduced, until today it is down to 8,000 plus.

As I pointed out a while ago, it has been reduced 234 in the past 2 years, while the State of Oklahoma had a very substantial increase during that same time. The Commission is doing everything in its power to bring about an adjustment under the quota system and unless you want to discharge a lot of people who are in the Government service it cannot be done more quickly.

With reference to this cry that we hear over here on our left that while the Republicans did blanket in a lot of people when they were in power, this is a bigger blanket that we are proposing here, and, as a matter of fact, it is not a blanket; the facts are that in the Taft administration—and I commend him for it—President Taft blanketed in without any examination 58,318 persons, which was 25 percent of the total Federal service approximately.

So I say to you that that was just as big a percentage as we are proposing today, because it is estimated that out of the employees affected by this act probably 200,000 to 250,000 will be brought in, and we have today over 900,000 Federal employees on the pay roll. Therefore, we are not proposing to do any worse than President Taft did in his administration, and I commend him for it because the only way the Republicans then in power could get anybody under the civil service was by writing an order and putting them under it.

The real purpose back of this fight by the Republican Party today is to keep these jobs out from under the civil service until 1941 in the vain hope they may elect a President and be able to replace them. [Applause.] I predict they will not do that. They will not keep them out and they will not elect a President in 1940 either, because we are going to win with our candidate in 1940 and we are going to put these people under civil service. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

TITLE I—EXTENSION OF CIVIL-SERVICE ACT

That notwithstanding any provisions of law to the contrary, the President is authorized by Executive order to cover into the classified civil service any offices or positions in or under an executive department, independent establishment, or other agency of the Government: Provided, That in the case of any federally owned and controlled corporation organized under the laws of any State, Territory, or possession of the United States (including the Philippine Islands), or the District of Columbia, the President is authorized to direct that such action be taken as will permit appointments to offices or positions in any such corporation to be made in accordance with the civil-service laws, consistently with the laws of any such State, Territory, or possession, or the District of Columbia, or with the charter or articles of incorporation of any such corporation.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, at the end of line 6, change the period to a colon and insert the following: "Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any positions in or connected with the Works Progress Administration."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the wording of the committee amendment be changed to read, "Work Projects Administration", the name of this agency having been changed since the amendment was reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, may I say in reference to the amendment that at the time the Committee acted upon this amendment the House had recently excluded from Executive orders issued by the President employees of the W. P. A. The committee felt that the House having recently acted upon that matter, the committee was following the expressed will of the House in eliminating any possibility of putting under the classified civil service the administrative staff of the W. P. A.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Why not also exclude by this amendment the P. W. A. and National Resources Committee?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not believe we should do so.

Mr. HARTER of New York. When will that be extinguished? In June of this year?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I see no reason why we should deny to those employees who have given faithful service the benefits of this legislation.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Even though their administration leaves the Government at that time?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is right. If they can be reinstated somewhere else later I should be glad to see them do it.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. I have an amendment at the desk which would exempt from title I of this bill all employees in any agency for which there is a date of expiration of its functions or its authority. Perhaps this amendment would be included in the other; if the gentleman would be interested in the other amendment I would be glad to have it read.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman I would not be in favor of his amendment because one of the reasons I am in favor of this bill is that I believe these people who have rendered faithful service ought to be given civil-service status, and if some of these agencies later go out of business then we ought to have available for the benefit of the Government the experience these persons have gathered as Government employees.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to my friend from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, I am certain that passage of this bill will be a real step in the direction of a better merit system for the Government.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman from West Virginia is absolutely correct.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I suppose the gentleman knows that on February 6 the President by Executive order authorized the Civil Service Commission to confer a competitive classified civil-service status upon some 40 employees assigned to the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor, including employees of the former Works Progress Administration, the former Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, the former National Emergency Council, and the office of the Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits of the Treasury Department. They are assigned to the Wage and Hour Division. That is another blanketing in of employees not in the civil service—another nonmerit order.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I am quite sure a noncompetitive examination was required.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. They were blanketed in noncompetitively by Executive order.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NICHOLS. May an amendment which proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert other matter be offered at any time during the process of the reading of the bill, or must it be offered at some particular point in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It may be offered at the conclusion of the reading of the first section, with notice that if it is adopted, motions will be made as subsequent sections are read that they be stricken out.

Mr. NICHOLS. Does the Chair mean by that statement that an amendment offered at the close of the reading of the first section to strike out all after the enacting clause would not be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It can be done after the reading of the first section, as soon as the committee amendment is disposed of.

Mr. NICHOLS. Could not that also be done at the close of the bill, after the reading of the entire bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It may be done at the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is it the intention of the Chair to have all amendments submitted before any amendments are voted on, or to vote on each one as it is offered?

The CHAIRMAN. Each amendment will be disposed of as it is offered.

Mr. HINSHAW. In its turn.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this bill is to bring under the civil service employees of the Government who are not now under it. We have heard a lot about alleged politics in the W. P. A. and elsewhere. I am against it, and I can prove it by my voting record on various measures and amendments that I have offered myself. But I cannot understand why, if we really want to get rid of politics in W. P. A. or elsewhere, you should exclude this agency from the terms of this bill. The only exception to the provisions of this bill is in the case of the W. P. A. I think that exception is out of harmony with the general purposes of the legislation.

I have no doubt that the inclusion of this amendment is due to a feeling of hostility on the part of some Members toward some of the officials or employees who at the present time or in the past have been connected with the W. P. A. I have a great deal of confidence in the people that are now responsible for this agency.

I believe it should be borne in mind that the bill before us seeks to bring positions into the classified service and the occupants of those positions, in order to acquire civil-service status, must first be recommended by the head of the agency where they are now employed, and this must be done within 1 year after such positions are brought within the classified service. If this is not done, then such an employee cannot acquire competitive civil-service status.

The head of the agency must also certify that this employee has performed satisfactory service for the 6 months immediately preceding the time that he is entitled to civil-service status, and then the employee must qualify through examination. Of course, in the event the employee fails to pass this examination it is provided that he must be dropped from the service within 6 months. This process affords ample opportunity for weeding out any occupants of positions who are not suitable for permanent retention. Furthermore, contrary to what I believe is the popular conception, even when brought into the competitive classified service an employee can be removed upon the preferment of charges without undue technicalities or delay.

Any public agency whose personnel is recruited in any other way than through the civil service procedure must naturally expect to be the target of complaint and criticism. The only way that a public service can be maintained on a businesslike basis is to maintain a civil-service system and, even if the criticisms directed against the personnel of the W. P. A. were all valid, which I am certain they are not, the only effective way to eliminate the cause of such criticism is to bring all positions within that agency within the terms of the competitive classified service.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the committee amendment and propose to vote against it. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REES of Kansas: Mr. REES of Kansas moves to strike out the first section of title I and insert in lieu thereof the following, and gives notice that if this amendment is adopted he will move to strike out each succeeding section of title I:

"That, notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary, the President is authorized by Executive order to cover into the classified civil service any position or group of positions in the executive branch of the Federal service which may now or may hereafter be exempted by statute from the provisions of the Civil Service Act of January 16, 1883 (22 Stat. 403).

"SEC. 2. The provisions of this act shall be held equally applicable to positions and employees in any corporation created under authority of an act of Congress which is controlled or owned by the United States Government, whether or not the employees thereof are paid from funds appropriated by Congress.

"SEC. 3. The incumbent of any permanent position which is affected by any Executive order which may be issued under authority of this statute, who does not already have a classified status, may acquire such a status in his position only upon receiving a new appointment as a result of an open competitive examination held by the Civil Service Commission for filling the position."

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is the bill H. R. 2700. It is the bill of the distinguished chairman of this committee, which has been discussed this afternoon. It is not exactly the bill I would like to pass, but at least it does provide for a competitive civil service.

The distinguished chairman left the floor a moment ago after making a political speech. He told us that the Republican side of the House did not want to put this measure through today because they were afraid that the majority party would blanket in some 300,000 employees, and the Republicans would not have a chance at them. Far be it from me to join him in that view—certainly not. As I tried to explain at the beginning of the debate, I am still in favor of a fair, honest, competitive system for the employment of these people. Let us employ the very best people we can find. They are employed by the taxpayers of your country, your Government and mine, and let us not have to go back and tell the folks at home the best we could get Congress to pass was a bill that would blanket in 300,000 employees that you have already appointed, and you are going to let them stay there without qualifying in a competitive examination. Let us not do that. I do not see how in the world you can explain that kind of vote if you do such a thing this afternoon.

All you really want, I think, is the best service you can get. So let us put in an honest and as fair a competitive system as we can get, and let us not shut out the million people who are now on the register and who cannot get jobs and who will not get jobs if you pass this measure, because, as I told you a while ago, as soon as these employees are dismissed from any branch of the Government service, they stand the first chance to get the places for which they seem to have qualified because of their political appointments.

Mr. Chairman, let us be fair about it. Let us support the amendment that I am submitting to you. Let us cast aside our politics and let us not talk about how many the Democrats appointed and how many the Republicans appointed or anything of that kind. Before I leave the floor this afternoon let me tell you again that you are going to give the President more power and authority, when you pass this bill, than has ever been given any President in a long time, in matters of this kind. This is one of those great authorities you pass over to the President and you say to him, "If you want to—you are not compelled to—you can blanket in these 300,000 people and they can keep their positions as long as they want."

A moment ago our distinguished Chairman said it would be unfair to these people who are now working in the branches of the Government about to go out of existence not to give them a civil-service status now, while they are still in the service, because they may be out in 2 or 3 or 5 or 6 months from now, and for that reason let us give them civil service now in order that they might have first chance on the jobs when they come up. Mr. Chairman, I hope the members of the Committee will see fit to support this amendment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas is the identical language contained in the bill (H. R. 2700) of the Seventy-fifth Congress. It would subject these positions to competitive examination, which would mean that the present incumbents of the positions would have to compete with people on the outside and would have to make a grade high enough to be one of the three highest in each case in order to have any chance of retaining their positions.

In addition to this, it means that the Civil Service Commission would be saddled with the responsibility of holding examinations for 300,000 positions for which there would probably be 3,000,000 applicants, which would cost $6,000,000 or more, and for which they have not the funds or an adequate staff at the present time. It is for this reason, Mr. Chairman, that I changed my mind about the method of bringing these people in. It is impracticable, it is impossible of accomplishment in my judgment, and would disrupt the present service of the agencies affected, because it has been estimated by the Commission that at least 75 percent of the employees now occupying positions would fail to be reappointed under that method.

In addition to that, I call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to the face that his amendment would not separate from the service a single employee now holding those positions, unless the President issued an order separating them after they fail to qualify in a competitive examination. The gentleman will recall that there was considerable testimony in the committee to the effect that H. R. 2700 had no provision for separating employees who fail to make a certain grade, even with a noncompetitive examination, and neither did H. R. 960 until the committee wrote it in. So the gentleman's proposal upon which we are about to vote would simply leave those people in the position and would not make it necessary to discharge them, no matter what was done about the examination.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. As I understand it, 75 percent of this help now is so incompetent that it could not pass a competitive civil-service examination.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I did not make any such statement. I said it had been estimated that 75 percent of them would fail of appointment, because others outside would make a higher grade, and some others would have veterans' preference over these people, and other things might contribute to it.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. The outsiders would be more competent under the civil-service rules. Then why require the keeping on of these people who are estimated to be 75 percent incompetent under the civil service?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman does not understand. They are not said to be incompetent at all, but the people who get the jobs as the result of a competitive examination are the people who make the highest grade in relation to others who take the examination.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. And that is the heart of the civil service?

Mr. RAMSPECK. That is a part of it, not necessarily the heart of it. I never have believed myself that it makes any difference whether you select them from the top three or from all who qualify so far as the civil service is concerned. I do not believe there is any sanctity about the fact that one man may make 100 and another 99. The man who makes 99 may be just as good an employee as the man who makes 100.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Then why refer to this as a merit bill?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of course, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts and I do not agree about what is a merit bill. I think H. R. 960 is a merit bill and I think we will get results on this and I do not think we would under the proposal of the gentleman from Kansas. Of course, a competitive examination would disregard the experience of these people, most of whom have been in the service 4, 5, or 7 years. Some have been in it as long as 20 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that anyone who cannot pass an examination after 4 or 5 or 6 years of experience ought not to hold the position. There are other positions outside that they might get. We want well-qualified people in our Government, and those already on the civil-service register should be protected.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I agree with the gentlewoman from Massachusetts, but the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas does not provide for separating them from the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. REES of Kansas) there were—ayes 62, noes 103.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, especially on the Democratic side—the Republicans may listen if they want to or they can take a walk. Because the Republicans are somewhat cocky about winning the election in 1940 is no particular reason for panic or fright, or that we should abdicate all legislation to them, as we have done a considerable portion of it already during this session. On all bills heretofore introduced and passed saying that appointments may be made regardless of the civil service, I voted for them in order that the heads of these departments might select them without regard to the civil-service rules. I want now to point out the inconsistency to those Members who were so vitally opposed to the civil service that they voted with me on that position. They said by their vote this other method was better than the civil-service method. These men got into these jobs under the methods that were selected by the Members at that time. They went into the jobs under a method that the Members said by their votes was a better method than the civil-service method. Now some of these same fellows are proposing to expose them to the ax in the event that there should be a storm in November 1940. I am going to tell the truth here. I would not say that there is a good deal of hypocrisy on both sides of this House, because that would be an uncomplimentary remark, but I do say that it is remarkably strange, when we are seeking under patriotic motives the best there is in Government service, with no other motive in mind except the good of the Government, that all of the Republicans see it one way, and one way only.

I want to endorse everything that has been said here in condemnation of the shortcomings of the Civil Service Commission. Down in my country they think the definition of civil service is a law whereby Republicans can get into office and stay there when we come into power. [Laughter.] It is more or less true. I have even known instances where three Democrats headed the list, and they froze that appointment for 6 months and then gave another examination. Nobody but a Republican ever got a job under civil service in my country when the Republicans were in power.

The only kind of merit system is one top man. If that were true, we would get our share of these places.

While I have very little to say about naming these men under these New Deal appointments—because the Senators name most of them—I recognize that some of the Congressmen have been a little peeved because they did not have a voice in them. But 95 or 98 percent of them are Democrats, and I say to you that that is my chief reason for voting for this bill. The Republicans have sponsored and catered and clamored so much about civil service that I want to give them some of the stuff they have been talking about. They will get them out, of course, but it will take them 2 or 3 years to do it. They will have to bring charges of one kind or another, and it will take them some time to do it.

Now, if this measure were proposed just at the start of the administration, I would oppose it, in order that we might have a wider field to choose from. But at this time I want to know whether or not these people that you call Democrats that are going about over your country, whether they are your kind or of your conviction; whether you are willing to go back and face them and say you had an opportunity to put him under the dry before this storm came on, but you did not do it, and you had exposed him. Now, after you get the merit system, suppose you do, if we leave it as the Republicans want it, they will not even have to go through the camouflage of sending these investigators out to fire these Democrats. It will be just as easy to fire them right now. But after we put them under, how many Democrats do you suppose will get a job, if you put them under civil service? You can count them on the fingers of one hand. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NICHOLS: On page 1, line 3, strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That a special joint committee of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the administration of the civil-service laws of the United States.

"It shall be the function of the special joint committee to conduct said legislation with the view of reporting to the Congress its recommendation for legislation which will reorganize said Commission and install a strict merit system for Government employees.

The special joint committee shall select a chairman from among its members and shall report to the Congress at the earliest practicable time the results of its study and investigation, together with its recommendation.

"For the purpose of this resolution the special joint committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings; to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjournment periods of the Seventy-sixth and succeeding Congresses; to employ such clerical and other assistance; to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; to administer such oaths; to take such testimony; and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of the stenographic expenditure to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $10,000, shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, upon vouchers approved by the chairman."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that the gentleman's amendment is not germane.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I will reserve the point of order if the gentleman desires to make a statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia reserves a point of order against the amendment. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I am frank to say that it is my opinion that a point of order will be sustained. But I wanted to take this opportunity to advise the House of what I think should be done. This amendment cannot be carried because it is not germane, but I certainly think there should be an investigation of the civil-service administration of the civil-service law, and that that law should be amended to do the thing that we are continually told it does do, to wit, install for the Government a system which will compel that employment not only be given, but be maintained upon a merit system. It seems to me it would be perfectly simple that there be a constant line of efficiency provided for, that must be lived up to, and that when you have gone a certain distance below that line of efficiency, the employee should be automatically discharged from service, and as you go above the constant line of efficiency, the right to promotion and salary advance should be determined. I think until you do that you do not have a merit system, and of course I do not think that the system we are working under even closely approaches the merit system.

Something has been said about the fact that we should pass this bill in order to protect the rights of some Government employees. I did not know that the civil-service law was passed to protect the rights of any individual. I thought the civil-service law was passed to protect the Government and to insure the Government that it would have a high type and a high standard of personnel.

I do not understand that Government employees have any vested right to any job. If they have, they should not have. Why should they have more of a vested right to a job than does the bank clerk, or a clerk in a grocery store, or a drug clerk, or a mechanic, or a millworker, or a miner, or a plumber who has to hold his job upon the basis of whether or not he renders service and upon the basis of whether or not he is qualified to do the job? I see many people in the gallery who are employed under this protective law. I do not think even the people holding jobs under civil service would have the audacity to say that they had any vested right in the job. Certainly these gentlemen do not mean what they say when they say this bill should be passed in order to protect Government employees who are now working for the Government but do not have civil-service status. I am not afraid of the people in my congressional district who hold Government jobs without civil-service status. If that is bad politics, all right; but they have no right to the job they hold unless they are discharging the duties of the job as they should be discharged. When the people get to the place where they do not do the job as it should be done they should be discharged. This is one of my complaints about civil service, for if an employee becomes inefficient in Government employment he should be discharged; if he has around him the cloak of civil service he will be retained despite the fact he is not worth the money he is drawing. For this reason I believe the House should consider long before it blankets in every Government employee who now has a job. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to see if we could not reach an agreement as to time on this section.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 5 minutes.

SEVEN LONG YEARS

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, the newspaper headlines state, "United States employees' pay roll hits 987,538, an all-time high."

Mr. Chairman, there are more employees on the Government pay roll today than ever before in the history of the Nation and the pay roll the largest. Seven long years ago the President of the United States said he would reduce bureaus, consolidate departments, and cut down the expenses of government. For 7 long years, however, his administration has been traveling the road to bigger and more burdensome departments, added bureaus, more employees, greater expenses. In 7 long years you have more than doubled the national debt. In 7 long years you have almost doubled the number of employees. When you came into office on March 4, 1933, there were 563,847 Government employees. You have increased that number by 423,691. Is that Government efficiency? Since last summer, when you promised efficiency in government, you have added 101,772 employees. Is this Government efficiency and economy?

Seven long years after you promised economy in government, what do we find you doing? We find you trying to freeze into office all these people you have added to the Federal pay roll—good and bad alike. It seems to me 7 long years is time enough to wait for promises to be fulfilled. Yet very few promises have been kept.

For 6 long years out of the 7 I have been asking: "Where are you going to get the money?" To date no one has been able to answer the question, and I find that now I must change it on account of the great Government burden of debt and instead ask, "With what kind of money are you going to pay these employees?" [Applause.] With what kind of money are you going to pay for the operations of the Government? With what kind of money are you going to handle the affairs of this Nation? A terrible, horrible thought for any American.

I warn you, gentlemen of the New Deal party, that if ever there was a serious time in the history of this Nation, that time is the present. You cannot deny it. I am sure the majority of the Members of the House feel about this as I do; yet you go along and enact legislation of which you are absolutely ashamed, legislation of which some can, and many would like to, go back to their constituents and say, "I am glad I did not have a part in it. I wish I had not voted for such legislation."

For my part I am mighty glad I opposed most of this legislation. The day is coming when you will rue it, you will regret it. The time has come, after 7 long years, when we ought to try using a little common sense and realize that the precarious situation of Government affairs is such that we must stop this wild upward spiral of inflation, and get back to earth. One of the worst things you ever did was to grant the President of the United States unlimited power and a fund of $4,880,000,000, telling the people of the country to come and get a hand-out. You destroyed the minds of too many of our citizens. The time has come when we should once again let the component parts of this Government, the municipalities, counties, and the States, begin to function as it was intended they should. The time has come when we should stop putting the Government further into business, stop leading the people of this country to believe the Government is going to support them. The people should support the Government. In 7 long years we should have learned our lesson. We ought to say to the people of America that we have gone far enough, that we, as Members of Congress, are going to turn over a new leaf and get back to home rule, put the power of government back into the hands of the Congress, and take it away from the President. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HINSHAW: Page 1, line 8, after the word "Government" and before the colon, insert: "special officers or positions in or under departments, independent establishments or other agencies of government, the authority for or the functions of which may expire by limitation of law or which are not specifically authorized by law".

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the amiable gentleman from Mississippi made a few remarks which were directed specifically to his own side of the House and perhaps I may be pardoned if I address a remark to my side of the House. He spoke for a moment about the desirability of selecting the No. 1 man from the civil-service list to receive an appointment regardless of his political affiliation. Of course, if they always selected the No. 1 man on the list he would probably be a Republican.

Mr. Chairman, there are a number of agencies in the Government for which authority is limited definitely by law and unless they are extended or made permanent they will expire. I have checked a number of them, and they are as follows, and I do not guarantee this list to be perfect, but I think it is pretty close to being perfect.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation; Disaster Loan Corporation; Public Works Administration; Civilian Conservation Corps; Petroleum Conservation Division, Interior Department; Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation; Golden Gate International Exposition; World's Fair Exposition; Works Progress Administration, or Work Projects Administration; National Youth Administration; National Resources Committee; and the National Emergency Council.

Mr. Chairman, if the employees and officers under these administrations are blanketed into the service by this bill and in the future by virtue of expiration of their function by limitation of time, the functions of these offices are abandoned, then, as I understand the civil-service procedure—and the chairman of the Committee on the Civil Service will correct me if I am wrong—the employees who would be let out on account of the abandonment of these bureaus and organizations would have priority on the civil-service list in their own classification for selection in other departments. Is that correct?

Mr. RAMSPECK. It is not entirely correct. If they served a certain length of time they have eligibility in other agencies. They do not have any right of reinstatement. It is a matter of discretion.

Mr. HINSHAW. They have priority on a list, if there is a list offered to another agency from which to make selections?

Mr. RAMSPECK. They do not go on any list. They have to find a vacancy and persuade the employing officer that he should reinstate them instead of taking somebody off an eligible list.

Mr. HINSHAW. They are nevertheless in competion directly with those on the eligible list by virtue of examination; is that not correct?

Mr. RAMSPECK. They have the right of reinstatement, or that privilege, if the appointing officer sees fit to employ them.

Mr. HINSHAW. These agencies have been created as temporary agencies by the majority side of the House, and I believe the minority side has largely concurred. It may be some will be favored as permanent agencies in the Government; however, until these agencies are made permanent it would appear to me to be the part of wisdom on both sides of the House to refrain from including them under the terms of this act. When and if they are made permanent, if they are to be so made, is time enough to blanket those employees directly into the service.

That might be done this year in the remaining months of this Congress or it may be done at some future time. I assure you I am not interested in the political angles involved in this, but I am primarily and basically interested in the civil service itself and I desire for the United States Government the best help in accomplishing its business that can be found, regardless of where it may be found.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Of course, these workers would have priority and they would have tenure of office. Some of the others on the eligible list have never held office or have never been employed in the Federal service. If they had ever held office, of course they would have priority.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, if 25 percent of the present unclassified employees who may be blanketed into the civil service under this act would be eliminated by a noncompetitive examination, and 75 percent would be eliminated by competitive examination, as has been acknowledged by speakers on this question, that would leave in the service 50 percent of inferior types of employees who would be blanketed into the service should this act pass without suitable amendment. At least half of these employees are admitted to be inferior to the type of employee now obtained under civil-service competitive examination procedure. It would appeal to me that this bill, without a competitive-examination feature resolves itself into a huge political racket.

If my amendment is adopted it will protect other agencies of government from an avalanche of inferior employees, on the average, when a temporary agency goes out of business, and give a greater opportunity to those qualified people who really can pass an examination, and who are fully entitled to get the positions.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I shall be happy to vote for the pending bill providing amendments are incorporated which will remove the vicious spoils antimerit system provisions and substitute real civil service merit system provisions for them.

What does the bill do? Several hundred thousand employees have been appointed to positions in agencies of the Federal Government which were created by the New Deal which now sponsors this bill. The legislation under which these jobs were created specifically prohibited the agencies from selecting these new employees under the civil service merit system.

Now, anticipating what is just around the corner, after the November 1940 election, these same new dealers ask us to perpetuate their political spoils system horde of new Federal Government pay rollers in office for life, and in order to do so bring in a political spoils system bill, such as this Ramspeck bill, H. R. 960, dressed up and camouflaged in the clothes of a civil service merit system. You propose to cover into the civil service about 200,000 New Deal political-spoils appointees. For instance, let us take a stenographer who makes a grade of 70 in a noncompetitive examination under this bill. You propose to cover her into a lifetime civil-service position and deny every other stenographer in the United States the opportunity to even compete. There are now on the civil-service eligible list many stenographers who have obtained an average of 95 and 98 in a competitive civil-service examination. Is that a merit-system proposition? That might be an example of a New Deal merit system. The New Deal proponents of this spoils-system bill can claim that a stenographer who can only make a grade of 70 is better qualified than a stenographer who can make a grade of 95 or 98 in an examination. I do not agree with this New Deal philosophy. Millions of people have taken civil service competitive examinations and are now on the eligible lists. Under this bill, you are going to deny them the opportunity of obtaining on their merits any of the 200,000 positions which under the pending bill are to be given to New Deal political appointees for life provided they make a passing grade of 70 in a noncompetitive examination. Under this bill you are going to deny all the people of the United States except 200,000 New Deal political spoils-system appointees the opportunity to compete for 200,000 Government positions. You will find that you will have a political roarback, my New Deal Democratic brethren. You pass this vicious political spoils system legislative monstrosity clothed in the robes of a civil service merit system bill, and when you get out and try to sell this legislative baby to the public the camouflage will be torn off, and, like Banquo's ghost, your vote in favor of this iniquitous measure will never die.

It will rise to haunt you in the future. When the facts are known throughout the country—and they will be known—your 200,000 political spoils system appointees might be satisfied, but the rest of the people will not be, particularly those who are discriminated against and those who believe in a real civil service merit system for public employment.

Mr. Chairman, the District of Columbia now has many thousands of employees in excess of its quota under the apportionment system of the classified civil service. The States of Virginia and Maryland and a number of other States are away over their quotas. We find that most of the States, in fact 39 of the States and Territories, are below the quota of which they are entitled. Under this bill you are going to increase the excess number of employees from the District of Columbia, from Virginia, from Maryland, and a few of the other States, and make it impossible for the citizens of 39 States and Territories which are now under their quota to have their quotas filled.

Mr. Chairman, I shall be very happy to support this bill if it is amended so as to put some merit-system teeth in it, remove some of the camouflage, and make it a real civil service merit system bill. This can be done if the bill is amended so that it requires that all Government administrative positions be placed under the competitive civil service and that the person highest on the eligible list receive the appointment to vacant positions.

Mr. Chairman, covering into civil service for lifetime positions 200,000 political appointees who make a grade of but 70 in a noncompetitive examination, and denying all of the other people in the country the right to compete for these positions, including many who can make a grade of 95 and 98, is political spoils of the rankest kind. I do not believe you will fool the American people. If you enact this iniquitous measure, the people will see to it that its ghost will never die. Like Banquo's ghost, it will rise to haunt you in the future. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, this bill could be improved—and I hope it may be before we have finished it—but if none of the amendments are accepted or if the motion to recommit is defeated, I intend to vote for the bill as the best measure that can be secured, because it means a step forward.

The history of the measure has not been completely disclosed. In order that any reader of the RECORD may know what has taken place, I crave your indulgence for these few minutes to recall that about 6 years ago when one of these new agencies was established—I think it was the Home Owners' Loan Corporation—Senator NORRIS secured from the Senate an amendment providing that the appointees of this agency should be selected under the merit system.

Mind you, the other branch approved that idea. It came over to the House and in the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I was and continue to be a member, a vote was taken in the late afternoon rejecting the proposal. We were afterward informed that the President had sent to the committee a letter asking that the proposal be accepted. It reached the committee chairman on the night that the Democrats of the committee had voted against it. The committee was not called to order to reconsider the matter and the proposal came before the House without the merit system in it. In a rather heated debate in which I took part I pleaded with the House to accept the view of the President, accept the view of the Senate, and adopt that provision. The Democrats of the House, in power, voted it down.

I thank heaven that they have seen the light. "While the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return." I thank the Democrats for remembering that adage. I thank them for now reversing the position they took 6 years ago. I thank them for being for the right.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The provision to which the gentleman referred applied only to certain persons on the eligible register who had civil-service status. That was not a blanketing in of many persons by means of noncompetitive examinations.

Mr. LUCE. I am not talking about detail, I have been talking about principle. Again I say, I thank the Democrats for coming to their senses and being for civil-service reform. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, there is no reason why we should adopt an amendment of this kind, which undertakes to apply a different rule to certain employees because the life of the agency in which they are working has a definite termination date. I happen to know right now of a man who has rendered 6 years of very fine service to one of these agencies but who has been furloughed because the agency is being liquidated. If he had been brought under civil service by an act like this, he would now be eligible for appointment in another agency I know of which is increasing its legal staff, but he does not have civil-service status and, therefore, is not eligible for employment under that agency.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. Would it not be true that this man could take the competitive examination and if he were capable of handling the job he could get it?

Mr. RAMSPECK. He could take the examination, but where he would land on the eligible list is one thing and this is another.

I believe there is a great deal to be said for the value of the experience these people have had in learning the Government technique and so-called red-tape procedure as it exists in every governmental agency, whether we like it or not. Certainly, I can see no reason for discrimination between these agencies mentioned in the gentleman's amendment and the other agencies, which his amendment does not cover. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be voted down. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HINSHAW) there were—ayes 73, noes 88.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a privileged motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BOREN moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, there have been many amendments offered here today to point out the necessity of change in this departmental bill. All of you know the many faults that should be corrected before this bill becomes law, and this proposal gives you an opportunity to send the bill back to the committee and make the committee come back in here with provisions that ought to be put in it.

Using this Mother Hubbard method to blanket in all employees of the bureaus not now under civil service grants lifetime tenure to incompetency as it may now exist and closes the door of opportunity to everyone not now on the pay roll.

Without a system of apportionment rigidly adhered to there can be no equality of opportunity. The people in the distant States are discriminated against in favor of those residing in or near the District of Columbia.

An impartial and analytical study of this great and sordid system which propagandizes the Nation to the glorification of bureaucracy under the guise of building a wall for the protection of merit, shows that it discredits and destroys the fundamental theory of representative government. My State and your State should have equal opportunity for representation on every commission and in every bureau of the Government.

The civil service leaves the door open for Communists to enter the Government and fosters and perpetuates the growth of communism within the bureaus by preventing any direct or indirect responsibility to the electorate on the part of Government personnel.

I do not want to control the employment of any individual in the Government service beyond the secretaries in my own office. I just want equal opportunity for every American. The present system is full of discrimination. It is the old patronage system in the hands of agents not responsible to the people. The bureaucrat has become the spoilsman. His greed for power knows no limit. I defy anyone to produce a single example where any Government bureau has ever voluntarily relinquished a power, voluntarily curtailed its expenditures, or voluntarily reduced the number of its personnel. They all want lifetime tenure for themselves. They all want the guaranty that nobody can disturb their security, regardless of public interest or welfare. It is a class system. It establishes a third estate. Self-interest is the only motive behind their demand for lifetime tenure and behind their wish to avoid competitive examination. Remove just one of these employees from the job he now holds and he would cry the loudest for at least a competitive opportunity to get it back again. We have already too many bureaucrats at the public feed trough. Let us not chain any more in the saddle of lifetime tenure. The public's back has saddle sores now.

I want to say for myself that I am greatly concerned about the constant enlargement of a third estate of people responsible to no one that threatens in the historical future of this country to destroy it by breaking its back with its ever-increasing burden. The entire history of democracy makes it clear that democracy has been a constant battle against people who held the reins of government for a lifetime and who during that lifetime are not at any period directly responsible to the people whose affairs and whose destinies they controlled.

I may say further, Mr. Chairman, that if there is any man on the floor at this time who believes that this bill that starts off in its first sentence by saying that irrespective of all law the President shall have power to do so and so, that this bill, which expands and perpetuates the system already in force—if there is any gentleman here who believes that it is fair to his State, fair to his people, and renders justice in opportunity to the individuals he represents, I would like to have him stand up at this juncture that I may present to him the statistics as they affect his State.

Mr. Chairman, I see no gentleman arise. I will not embarrass the individual Members here by pointing out to them what the condition is as it affects their people. The Congress of the United States is organized on the theory that every part of the country should be represented. If there is any agency of government in which all of the people from all of the sections of the country should not have a representative to indicate and protect their viewpoint, their background, and their experience I do not know what that agency could be.

I want to repeat, Mr. Chairman, that I hold in my hand the evidence that under this system—and I would believe in a merit system if we could find one—the people in your districts are ruled incapable, your State is discriminated against, and the selections are made many times, in my judgment, on the basis of race prejudice, on the basis of personal prejudice, on the basis of relationship, either blood or other ties, and the civil-service system has grown up to be a third estate within its own organization more corrupt than any patronage system we have ever had.

I would like to see this Committee send this bill back to the committee that wrote it with the understanding that we would like to see them bring something in here that would be a real merit system, that would see every nook and corner of the United States of America have an equal chance to be represented in the administrative branch of the Government.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RAMSPECK. If the quota system has operated as the gentleman seems to believe, how does he account for the fact that in the last few years Oklahoma has gained 196, while the District of Columbia has lost 234?

Mr. BOREN. I will say to the gentleman that if the State of Oklahoma has gained 196, the State still has only 60 percent of what it is entitled to.

Mr. NICHOLS. And the District of Columbia is more than 3,000 percent over its quota.

Mr. BOREN. The gentleman is correct and I appreciate that contribution to my remarks; and may I point out that the State of Georgia, which the gentleman represents, has about 50 percent of the employees that it is entitled to in the administration of the Government despite the fact that the gentleman brought this bill in and is the chairman of the Civil Service Committee.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I would like to have the figures for Kentucky.

Mr. BOREN. Kentucky is short of its pro rata share. They have approximately 35 percent of what they are entitled to.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not make that request. There are many people here who are anxious to conclude the consideration of this bill, and we want to wind the matter up. I shall have to object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I shall not object to that request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, may I say here that time will not permit me to give all of these figures, but I wish it were possible for every one of you to examine carefully the situation as it affects your State.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman give us the figures for Minnesota and Nebraska and also for Alabama?

Mr. BOREN. Minnesota has its just share. [Laughter.]

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I thank the gentleman. That is a good Republican State.

Mr. BOREN. I might add that most of the States that have their just share are Republican States.

Mr. STEFAN. How about Nebraska?

Mr. BOREN. The State of Nebraska is not under quota.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. How does the State of Michigan stand in the line-up?

Mr. BOREN. The State of Michigan has approximately 40 percent of what it is entitled to.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I ask someone on my right if they want to perfect a system which would be more than fair to approximately 9 States and far less than fair to the 39 other States.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am sure that the Members on this side of the aisle want fairness to all States under a strictly merit system, and not a noncompetitive proposition.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. Yes.

Mr. HAWKS. Does the gentleman say that all but two States in the list he has there have their quota, and that they are Republican?

Mr. BOREN. I said that most States that have in excess of their quota are Republican States.

Mr. HAWKS. I thought Jim Farley said that we had only two States.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I quote from section 2, paragraph 3, of the civil-service law of 1883, as amended:

> Third, appointments to the public service aforesaid in the departments at Washington shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census. Every application for an examination shall contain, among other things, a statement, under oath, setting forth his or her actual bona fide residence at the time of making the application, as well as how long he or she has been resident of such place.

Despite this provision of the law, only 49,000 of the many thousand civil-service employees have ever been placed under any apportionment system, and an analysis of that 49,000, according to the Commission's own figures, indicates no serious effort to follow the intent of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOREN) the motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 2. The incumbent of any office or position which is covered into the classified civil service under the provisions of section 1 of this act shall not thereby acquire a classified civil-service status, except (1) upon recommendation by the head of the agency concerned within 1 year after such office or position has been covered into the classified civil service, and certification within such period by such head to the Civil Service Commission that such incumbent has served with merit for not less than 6 months prior to the date such office or position was covered into the classified civil service; and (2) upon passing such suitable noncompetitive examination as the Commission may prescribe:

With the following committee amendment:

> Page 2, line 17, after the word "months" insert the word "immediately."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the other committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 2, at the end of line 20, strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That any such incumbent who fails to pass the noncompetitive examination provided in his case shall be separated from the service not later than 6 months after the Commission advises the appointing officer that such employee has failed."

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts to the committee amendment: At the end of page 2 add the following: "Provided further, That no such incumbent shall continue to have a classified status after January 1, 1941, unless he shall have passed an open competitive examination for such position and have been appointed in accordance with the Civil Service Act and rules."

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, this is a very simple amendment. It allows for the taking into the civil service of these two or three hundred thousand if they pass a noncompetitive examination, but if within a year thereafter they are not able to pass an open competitive examination they lose their civil-service status. That does not put them out of their position, but they lose their civil-service status. It seems to me that the chairman of the committee ought to be willing to accept this amendment. It is a real merit amendment and yet it gives quite a little advantage to those already in the various Government departments about to be taken in noncompetitively. It will give them a year's time in which to learn how to pass an examination if they are not already qualified to do so. It seems to me that the people should not have a civil-service status if, after the experience they have already had, plus another year in the work of their department they cannot pass a competitive examination. I am heartily in favor of the merit system. I have supported every merit bill. I use the system myself. I practice what I preach. I take the top men in the post-office examinations and in every other appointment I have made I always do the same thing. It helps your employed people now who have no civil-service status, and yet it is fair to those already on the rolls. It will make for very much better administration in the departments. You will then have well-qualified people who can do their work, and under this bill you have 300,000 who may be taken in noncompetitively, as against a million workers all over the country now on the civil-service list. I earnestly hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. TABER. What are those who vote against the gentlewoman's amendment going to say to the young men and women who have obtained high ratings on open competitive examinations and cannot get a job because of the passage of this bill and the holding of the job by one of the 75 percent who could not pass a competitive examination?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I think that it will be extremely awkward for them. I remind them that a million people are scattered all through their districts now who are asking that question. They are already asking why the people who did not take the trouble to pass a competitive examination are given advantage over them, and they are extremely bitter. I believe, in view of the tremendous unrest, even at home, we should be very careful of the type we take into our permanent Government employ.

Yesterday I called the attention of the House to the necessity of a careful investigation of applicants for Government employment. Since then I have obtained more data concerning this very important subject. That it has been uppermost in the minds of the Civil Service Commissioners is indicated by the remarks of Commissioner Arthur S. Flemming in his talk before the Federal Bar Association, when he said:

> We haven't been able to do as much as we should on character investigation. This would save money for the public by doing away with later costs of eliminating undesirables in the service. But I realize it isn't easy to dramatize preventive measures, as it is to dramatize corrective actions taken later. Studies have shown that 20 percent of applicants for law-enforcement agencies are disqualified by investigation.

As it is constituted today, with the small amount of funds available and at its disposal, the Civil Service Commission is unable to take care of these investigations. From data in my possession, it is shown that during the first 6 months in 1939 the Commission had an arrearage in its investigations division of 1,053 cases. During the first 6 months of 1940—fiscal year—it had an arrearage of 2,782. This means that the Commission is behind in some of its districts on investigating work as much as 7 months. Something should be done to remedy this situation, which is fraught with the greatest danger to our Federal Government. Many of the persons to be investigated are in key positions in the Government, positions in which valuable data and most confidential data are entrusted to the incumbent.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto close in 2 minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. RAMSPECK. The committee amendment and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I object. I think there are a number who want time. We were only allowed 2 hours of general debate on this matter.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I would like to have the last 2 minutes reserved for the committee, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition for 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, several have spoken expressing sympathy for the million young people who will be deprived of opportunity by the passage of this bill; what will they think of this proceeding? In line with what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] stated about the public debt, I wish to remark that when our young people do learn about the huge public debt placed upon them and about what you have done here today "it will be the end of ancestor worship." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is most unfair that debate on this amendment be limited to 10 minutes. It is not sufficient time. We have here a proposition that determines the question whether or not you are in favor of a bill that would allow at least a year for these employees to come under competitive civil service. You should support this amendment. I do not see how in the world you can explain your vote if you do not vote in favor of the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Massachusetts. All in the world the amendment seeks to do is to provide that after the expiration of 1 year, next January, 1941, if these people are unable to pass a competitive civil-service examination they will not be civil-service employees and they will not have a civil-service status. That is all there is to it. They are not necessarily dismissed from the service. You certainly should be willing to vote for that sort of an amendment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this amendment prevents blanketing in 171,000 employees who are incompetent according to civil-service standards. It is admitted that only 18 percent would be dropped through noncompetitive examinations and that 75 percent would be dropped by competitive examinations. This means that the Ramspeck bill proposes to hold in the Federal service 171,000 who are not as good as those outside the service who are eligible to take competitive examinations. It will require the passage of the Rogers amendment to keep this a civil-service bill and prevent it from being a "fizzle service" bill, such as we had in effect out in Ohio. If your purpose is to get and hold competent help in the Government service, you should vote for this amendment. If your purpose is to freeze in incompetent employees, to hold them in after their party leaves, and to have a "fizzle service" instead of a civil service, then you should vote against this amendment. If your purpose is to vote for the merit system, you should vote for this amendment.

Much is said about the quota system. At the present time, I am reliably informed that the only knowledge as to the quota situation—the State residence—of these 300,000 employees is in Farley's office. Nobody can tell how they will fit into the quota system. If you want a real civil-service system instead of this hypocritically misnamed bill before us, vote for this amendment and you will then make a bill that provides civil service. Discretion to cover employees is solely in the hands of the President under section 1, which has already been adopted, and therefore with this amendment the system can be extended just as far as the President wants to extend real civil service, as the people understand it, under competitive examinations.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, we have already voted upon the substance of this amendment in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES], which would have provided for a competitive examination. We voted that amendment down. This is an attempt to do by indirection what was attempted to be done by direction. The people who are familiar with the testimony before the committee know that it will cost $6,000,000 to hold these examinations, and they cannot be held within 1 year. The Commission is now behind at least a year in its work. So the only effect of it would be to declare these positions vacant, and I say let us vote down the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment, offered by the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts) there were ayes 82 and noes 101.

So the amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HARTER of New York: Page 2, line 13, after the word "concerned," strike out all of that page from there on, and insert:

"and certification to the Civil Service Commission that such incumbent has served with merit for not less than 6 months immediately prior to the date such office or position was covered into the classified civil service; and (2) then only being certified by the Civil Service Commission as a result of an open competitive examination held by the Commission for filling such position, except that all such incumbents taking the examination shall be allowed 10 points for experience by the Civil Service Commission in addition to their earned rating in the examination for entrance to the classified service: Provided, That any such incumbent who fails to qualify for appointment into the classified service shall be separated from the service not later than 6 months after the Commission announces the result of the examination: And provided further, That no person shall be certified to fill such position who advocates, or who is a member of an organization that advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States through force or violence.

"2–A. The examination referred to in section 2 of this act shall be held within 1 year from the date the office or position therein referred to is covered into the classified civil service under the provisions of section 1 of this act."

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I wish the Members would listen to this amendment. It is a rather long amendment, but I think perhaps I can boil it down a bit.

This amendment is aimed at doing the following: It is aimed at putting these jobs on a competitive examination basis. The chairman of the Civil Service Committee has brought out the point many times that those in service have gained valuable knowledge, that should not be lost to the Government. So having that in mind, I have provided in this amendment that those holding those jobs should have a 10-point preference, so that will give them that much more of an advantage.

Then, in addition to that, I have provided that no one can be appointed who belongs to an organization whose policy is to overthrow the Government by force.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTER of New York. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Is not the gentleman aware that section 9 (e) of the Hatch Act goes further than the gentleman's proposal and makes it unlawful to employ any person who advocates the overthrow of the Government either by force or not?

Mr. HARTER of New York. That is in the Hatch Act and should apply to this too. We have the additional advantage here. These people would be put under oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and the burden is put upon the department heads in selecting these people to see that they are not inclined toward overthrowing our form of government.

Then, answering the question the gentleman from Georgia I am sure will raise about the insurmountability of conducting these examinations, I have provided that the examinations shall be held within 1 year from the date that the President shall put the positions under civil service, according to section 1 of this act. The President does not have to put them all under at one time, but can cooperate with the Civil Service Commission so that the examinations can be worked out over a period of years.

If this has got to be done, of course, before January 1, 1941, then my amendment should not be adopted, but if extension of the merit system is something that we all believe in, this accomplishes that purpose by having a competitive examination and giving credit to those who are in these jobs by your appointment. May I say to the gentlemen on my right, at the same time we will be working with the Civil Service Commission so that we need not have a great expense tacked on us at one time. Thus the examinations can be conducted at various times in the years to come, and in the meantime your people are still in the jobs. This is an attempt to get something approaching a merit system while at the same time giving you people a chance to keep your appointees in the jobs until they have a chance to pass the examinations. Further than that, it gives them 10 points credit for their experience in the Government service.

If you really want to extend the civil service on a merit basis, I repeat, this is your chance. In view of the fact that you turned down the amendment which sought to substitute H. R. 2700 for the pending bill, your next best bet is to vote for this amendment. To my mind, if you do not support it, it shows your lack of sincerity in attempting to support the merit system.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTER of New York. I yield.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I am just wondering if the effect of the language employed by the gentleman in his amendment would not be to destroy the purpose to give the ex-service men an advantage?

Mr. HARTER of New York. No. The gentleman from Oklahoma, and I am sure the chairman of the committee, too, will agree if he will read the balance of the bill as it now stands, the veteran would still have his advantage with my amendment adopted. The veteran would be entitled to 20-percent credit instead of 10 if he is now working in one of the jobs and takes the competitive examination. I hope this amendment is adopted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REES of Kansas: On page 2, at the end of the page insert a colon and the following proviso:

"Provided further, That no further appointments shall be made hereunder except on the basis of the apportionment and quotas provided by law and the rules and regulations that have been adopted by the Civil Service Commission pursuant thereto."

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this covers the much discussed and debated problem that has been mentioned during the afternoon, the principal objection being that a great many of these people who have been put on the pay roll are from the District of Columbia. Here is your chance to take care of this situation if you want to.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman from Kansas that I have no objection to his amendment.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I thank the gentleman, but before I relinquish the floor I do want to say that I was astonished that no one on the majority side of the House was willing to go along with the gentlewoman from Massachusetts and support her amendment. She certainly was more than fair, because all in the world she asked you to do was to provide that after 1941 if these people could not pass a civil-service examination they would not have a civil-service status. They would even be dismissed from the service.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLER as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. REES of Kansas: Page 2, line 9, after "SEC. 2.", insert "(a)"; and after line 25, insert the following:

"(b) Notwithstanding any of the provisions of subsection (a), no person shall be appointed, transferred, or promoted to any position covered into the classified civil service under the provisions of section 1 of this act if such person is from a State whose quota of positions in the classified civil service is more than filled unless and until the quota of all States whose quota of positions in the classified civil service is unfilled has become filled. As used in this section the term 'State' includes the Territories and the District of Columbia."

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to call attention to the fact that we desire to modify and correct the fact that there is a very great discrepancy between the number of civil-service employees from the various States. It is a misfortune that the civil service has not wiped that out heretofore. I have taken this matter up with the drafting committee, and the amendment which I have offered is the result of that conference. At the same time I took the matter up with the chairman of the Committee on the Civil Service, and he requested that I take it up with the Civil Service Commission, which I did. The amendment as read is acceptable to the Civil Service Commission as well as to the chairman of the Committee on the Civil Service.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I would like to verify the gentleman's statement. The Civil Service Commission has no objection. It affects the filling of vacancies in these positions or transfer of these people to other places.

Mr. KELLER. I believe it is the best thing to do and I believe it will correct a bad situation. That is the reason I have offered it.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NICHOLS to the amendment offered by Mr. KELLER as a substitute to the amendment offered by Mr. REES of Kansas: After the word "be" in line 2 of the amendment, insert "covered into civil service."

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, my amendment to the Keller amendment simply means that these employees cannot be covered into civil service until the quotas of all States have become full. If we are going to straighten out this quota proposition we better straighten it out. If we permit them to be blanketed into civil service, the Keller amendment does not mean anything, because it says they shall not be appointed, employed, and so forth. Why, they are already employed and if you blanket them in they are under the tent.

If you want to do this thing right, if you want to really balance the quota proposition, vote for my amendment, because if the amendment will accomplish what I think it will, they cannot be blanketed in until the quotas have adjusted themselves. Let me tell you the States that will be affected by this amendment, and there are 33 of them in number. They are: California, Texas, Louisiana, Michigan, Arizona, New Jersey, South Carolina, Ohio, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Alabama, New Mexico, Arkansas, Georgia, Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee, Illinois, Wisconsin, Connecticut, Indiana, Delaware, Oregon, Nevada, Florida, Idaho, New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, New York, Maine, Massachusetts, Utah, and West Virginia.

In fairness, I should say that the last seven States have quotas over 90 percent. I mean, they are within 10 percent of their quota, but above them the quotas are very low.

The chairman of the Committee on Civil Service has accepted the Keller amendment. I do not presume he will accept my amendment, because my amendment will make it necessary for quotas to be adjusted before these employees are blanketed into the civil service. The Keller amendment is ineffective, and I do not mean to criticize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] because it uses the words "employment," "appoint," and so forth. They have already been employed and appointed and if they are blanketed in, they are under the tent.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES of Kansas. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to go along with the gentleman from Oklahoma on his amendment.

Mr. NICHOLS. I thank the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois has been submitted to the Civil Service Commission, and I think it has been carefully considered and is workable. The amendment which the gentleman from Oklahoma offers will do something that none of us can foresee. There is no proof of the statement which he makes, and which I am sure he believes, that it will help adjust the quota system. As a matter of fact, it might bring about a greater loss to his own State than a gain, because we have no figures here to show where the employees who are affected by this bill come from.

Mr. NICHOLS. That is all right with me.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, we do not know whether we would be penalizing the States he named or helping them to balance the quota provisions in this bill. No one can tell. Therefore I think the wise thing to do is to adopt the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois has offered which applies the quota system to these jobs hereafter.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman will admit, will he not, that if a State's quota is under 100 percent, representing the full quota for the State, my amendment would certainly help that State to the extent that its quota would have to be filled before States who were over their quotas could have their people blanketed in?

Mr. RAMSPECK. No; I do not admit the correctness of the gentleman's statement, because the State may have more people in these agencies not under civil service than it takes to fill its quota; therefore some of the people now employed from the gentleman's State might be kept out of the civil service in order to fill the quota of some other State that is farther away from 100 percent than his. Frankly, I do not know how it would operate.

Mr. NICHOLS. If it is necessary for Oklahoma to take some loss in order to play fair with the rest of the States, I am one gentleman from Oklahoma who would be willing to punish Oklahoma a little in order to see that all States got exactly the same treatment.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, if the Committee agrees to any amendment, I hope it will agree to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the Committee divided, and there were—ayes 62, noes 73.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. NICHOLS and Mr. RAMSPECK.

The Committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 114, noes 77.

So the amendment to the substitute amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER], as amended, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

The substitute amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas as amended by the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE II—EXTENSION OF CLASSIFICATION ACT

SEC. 3. (a) Subject to the limitations contained in this section, whenever the President, after such classification and compensation surveys or investigations as he may direct the Commission to undertake, and upon consideration of the Commission's resulting reports and recommendations, shall find and declare that an extension of the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to any offices or positions in the agencies of the Government is necessary to the more efficient operation of the Government, he may by Executive order extend the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to any such offices or positions not at the time subject to such provisions: Provided, That in the case of any federally owned and controlled corporation organized under the laws of any State, Territory, or possession of the United States (including the Philippine Islands), or the District of Columbia, the President is authorized to direct that such action be taken as will permit the compensation of such offices or positions to be fixed in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, consistently with the laws of any such State, Territory, or possession, or the District of Columbia, or with the charter or articles of incorporation of any such corporation.

(b) Whenever the President, upon report and recommendation by the Commission, shall find and declare that one or more officers or positions to which the Classification Act of 1923, as amended and extended, is applicable, may not fairly and reasonably be allocated to the professional and scientific service, the subprofessional service, the clerical, administrative, and fiscal service, the custodial service, or the clerical-mechanical service, as described in the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, he may by Executive order prescribe and define such additional classification services and grades thereof as he may deem necessary and shall describe, and fix the ranges of compensation for, the grades of such services within the limits of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, so that they shall be comparable, as nearly as may be, with the grades in said act, as amended, for offices or positions that are comparable as to duties, responsibilities, qualifications required, and other conditions of employment.

(c) Whenever the President, upon report and recommendation by the Commission, shall find and declare that the rates of the compensation schedules of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, are inadequate for any offices or positions under such act, as amended and extended, he may by Executive order establish necessary schedules of differentials in the rates prescribed in such compensation schedules, but the differentials in the compensation of any such office or position shall not exceed 25 percent of the minimum rate of the grade to which such office or position is allocated under such compensation schedules: Provided, That the provisions of this subsection shall be applicable only to such offices or positions having the following characteristics:

Offices or positions which are located at stations that are isolated, remote, or inaccessible when compared with stations at which offices or positions of the same character are usually located, or which involve physical hardships or hazards that are excessive when compared with those usually involved in offices or positions of the same character, or which are located outside the States of the United States and the District of Columbia: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall preclude the Commission from taking the factor of isolation, hardship, hazard, or foreign service into consideration in allocating a given class of offices or positions to a service and grade under the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, if such factor is uniformly involved in each office or position in the class, in which event no differential is authorized under this section.

(d) Except as Congress may otherwise provide by law, the power granted to the President by this section shall not apply to the following:

(i) Offices or positions in the Postal Service the compensation of which is fixed under an act of Congress approved February 28, 1925 (43 Stat. 1033), as amended;

(ii) Offices or positions of teachers, librarians, school-attendance officers, and employees of the community-center department under the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, the compensation of which is fixed under an act of Congress approved June 4, 1924 (43 Stat. 367), as amended;

(iii) Offices or positions in the Metropolitan Police, in the Fire Department of the District of Columbia and in the United States Park Police, the compensation of which is fixed under an act of Congress approved July 1, 1930 (46 Stat. 839);

(iv) Commissioned officers and enlisted personnel in the military and naval services and the Coast Guard, and commissioned officers in the Public Health Service and the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the compensation of which is fixed under an act of Congress approved June 10, 1922 (42 Stat. 625), as amended;

(v) Offices or positions in the Government Printing Office the compensation of which is fixed under an act of Congress approved June 7, 1924 (43 Stat. 658);

(vi) Offices or positions of foreign-service officers in the Foreign Service of the United States the compensation of which is fixed under an act of Congress approved May 24, 1924 (43 Stat. 140), as amended;

(vii) Offices or positions of clerks in the Foreign Service of the United States the compensation of which is fixed under an act of Congress approved February 23, 1931 (46 Stat. 1207);

(viii) Offices or positions of commercial attachés, assistant commercial attachés, trade commissioners, and assistant trade commissioners in the Foreign Commerce Service of the Department of Commerce, the compensation of which is fixed under an act of Congress approved March 3, 1927 (44 Stat. 1394), as amended;

(ix) Offices or positions of verifiers-openers-packers, clerks, guards, inspectors, station inspectors, and laborers in the Customs Service of the Treasury Department the compensation of which is fixed under an act of Congress approved May 29, 1928 (45 Stat. 955), as amended;

(x) Offices or positions of inspectors in the Immigration and Naturalization Service of the Department of Labor the compensation of which is fixed under an act of Congress approved May 29, 1928 (45 Stat. 954), as amended;

(xi) Offices or positions the duties of which are to serve as an officer or member of the crew of a vessel, except that the President may by Executive order extend the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to offices or positions in the Bureau of Lighthouses; and

(xii) Offices or positions the duties of which are to perform the work of an apprentice, helper, or journeyman in a recognized trade or craft, or other skilled mechanical craft, or the work of an unskilled, semiskilled, or skilled laborer, except that whenever such offices or positions involve work in the regular custody, operation, or maintenance of a Government building, or other Government property, or work which is subordinate, incidental, or preparatory to work of a professional, scientific, or technical character, the President, upon a finding that the characteristics and working conditions of such offices or positions render them substantially the same as comparable offices or positions in the District of Columbia included within the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, may by Executive order extend the provisions of such act to include them.

SEC. 4. The President is authorized, after suitable investigation by the Commission, which shall include consultation with representatives of the heads of executive departments and independent agencies, in or under the jurisdiction of which the offices or positions hereinafter designated are located, and upon a finding that such action is necessary to the more efficient operation of the Government, to exclude, by Executive order, from the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended and extended under this act—

Offices or positions on work which is financed jointly by the United States and a State, Territory, or possession of the United States (including the Philippine Islands), or political subdivision thereof, or cooperating persons or organizations outside the service of the Federal Government, and the pay of which is fixed under a cooperative agreement with the United States; offices or positions, none or only part of the compensation of which is paid from funds of the United States; offices or positions filled by inmates, patients, students, or beneficiaries in Government institutions; offices or positions outside the States of the United States and the District of Columbia filled by natives of Territories or possessions of the United States (including the Philippine Islands) or foreign nationals; emergency or seasonal offices or positions in the field service, or other field offices or positions, the duties of which are of purely temporary duration, or which are required only for brief periods at intervals; and offices or positions filled by persons employed locally on a fee, contract, or piece-work basis who may lawfully perform their duties concurrently with their private profession, business, or other employment and whose duties require only a portion of their time, where it is impracticable to ascertain or anticipate the proportion of time devoted to the service of the Federal Government.

SEC. 5. When any extension of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, becomes effective under this act—

(a) The allocations of offices or positions to services, grades, and classes shall be made as set forth in section 4 of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and in accordance with a uniform procedure to be prescribed by the Commission; and

(b) The initial compensation of the incumbents of the offices or positions to which the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, are extended under this act, shall be fixed in accordance with section 6 of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, except that if an officer or employee is receiving compensation in excess of the maximum rate prescribed for the appropriate grade, no change by reason of this fact shall be made in his existing compensation so long as he continues to occupy the same office or position, but the office or position shall be correctly allocated and when it becomes vacant the compensation attached thereto shall be brought within the compensation schedule, in accordance with existing law.

SEC. 6. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the promotion of an officer or employee from an office or position in one class to a vacant office or position in a higher class at any time in accordance with civil-service laws, and when so promoted the officer or employee shall receive compensation according to the schedule established for the class to which he is promoted. Nor shall anything in this act be construed to prevent the application of the existing veteran-preference provisions in civil-service laws, Executive orders, and rulings.

SEC. 7. Section 9 of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended (42 Stat. 1490; U. S. C., 1934 ed., title 5, sec. 669), is hereby further amended by adding at the end thereof the following paragraph:

"Under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Civil Service Commission with the approval of the President—

"There shall be established in each Department one or more boards of review, each of which shall be composed of three or more members, the chairman to be designated by the Civil Service Commission and the other members to be designated by the head of the Department concerned. The boards of review shall meet at the call of their respective chairmen for the purpose of considering and passing upon the merits of such efficiency ratings assigned to employees as may be submitted to such boards of review as hereinafter provided. Any employee shall, upon written request to the chairman of the appropriate board of review of his department, be entitled, as a matter of right, to a hearing and a review by such board of review of his efficiency rating. After any such hearing, the board of review may make such adjustments in any such efficiency rating as it may find to be proper."

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time in order to ask the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia, to explain briefly, if he will be kind enough to do so, just what effect the amendments and the substitutes which have just been voted on have on the bill which is before the Committee for consideration.

Mr. RAMSPECK. My understanding of the effect of the amendments is that, because of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma, no person who comes from a State that is in excess of its quota or has its quota can be covered under civil service as a result of the passage of this bill. I am very much opposed to this because I do not know exactly how it will operate. I believe we ought to extend equal privileges to everybody under this bill.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I favor the quota system. This may sound like an unusual statement, because the State of Virginia is over quota, the State of Maryland is over quota, and the District of Columbia is over quota. This situation has been explained many times by the Civil Service Commission, who are now trying to put into effect as best they can the quota provisions of the civil-service law.

The great over-quota status of the States of Virginia and Maryland and the District of Columbia arose out of the fact that during the World War period, when it became necessary for the Government overnight to recruit people into the Federal service, many of them in low-priced positions and many of them in the purest temporary status, when they were advertising and begging people to come and take these jobs necessary to run the war, they were glad to get people from the District of Columbia, Virginia, and Maryland, who could live in the adjoining counties of Virginia and Maryland and work in Washington cheaply. These people were glad to have these jobs. Your constituents at far distances were not interested in coming to Washington and taking these purely temporary positions where the positions would not be guaranteed for longer than a month or two. They were not interested in coming and taking these positions on a purely temporary basis. As a result, Virginia, Maryland, and the District of Columbia became very much over quota.

However, as the gentleman from Georgia has so well pointed out, in recent years under repeated declarations of the policy of the Congress, the quota system has been observed.

What do you undertake to do here today? You take a citizen of Virginia or Maryland or the District of Columbia, who may have been working in one of these departments for 10 or 15 or 20 years in an unclassified status, and you say to him, arbitrarily, that until some distant State fills its quota he cannot profit by this merit system. What kind of a rule of logic or reason is that? What kind of fair play is it? These people are working for the Government, and they are working for the Government because we permitted them to be employed. If the merit system is right for the State of Oklahoma, why is it not right for these people from Virginia who are working there; and what kind of a rule is it?

I saw my good friends over here on the left voting solidly for the Nichols amendment. I am surprised at you. I am surprised at the House for doing it, and I do not believe the House understood the full import of it.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. Did not these people from Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia take the jobs at that time as a matter of patriotic duty?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Many times they did.

The Civil Service Commission will tell you today, if you will ask them, that when they advertise a temporary appointment for a junior stenographic position and send out invitations to the persons on the civil-service register in distant States and tell them the appointments are only temporary appointments, those persons almost invariably write back saying they are not interested in the positions and do not want them.

These are the facts, and I submit to the Committee that the action just taken is very unfair to people who are in the Government service and who are just as much entitled to have the benefit of this bill. If it is good for one it ought to be good for all.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. These nine States probably have thousands of employees on the pay roll now, and some of them have worked for the Government for 20 years. Every one of the employees from those nine States will suffer an unjust discrimination, through no fault of his own, by reason of the action of this House this afternoon.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. If this action stands, it will; but I am confident when we get in the House the action will not stand. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this title and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I trust I will be pardoned for taking this time. I would not have asked it had not my good friend the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] employed a pro forma amendment in order to advise the House of his views. I certainly do not want that anyone should have supported the amendment offered by me under misapprehension, and the gentleman from Georgia has stated it well. The Nichols amendment simply provides that those people from States who are above the quota of that State cannot be blanketed into civil service until those States which are below their quota have been brought up to the quota.

Now, I think it was grand that Maryland and Virginia so nobly responded to the call in 1917 and 1918 that they gave themselves as a sacrifice in service to the Federal Government under the protection of civil service. I do not want to see a single one of those boys, men, or women lose their jobs. If they have civil service, I am perfectly willing that Virginia should have 209 percent above her quota. I am perfectly willing that Maryland should have 313 percent above her quota. I am perfectly willing that the District of Columbia should have 4,578 percent above its quota. I am willing for them to go on above that, if they will just wait until the rest of us boys catch up [applause], not to where they are but just to our quota; and after all is said and done, that is the effect of the Nichols amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. May I not call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the amendment which I offered contained, until I cut it out, a provision that might have endangered the present positions of these people who will not be taken under the civil service, but under this amendment not a one of them will lose his present job, but they will not get any civil-service status until all the States have been treated fairly and no man will lose his job.

Mr. NICHOLS. That is right.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 960) extending the classified Executive civil service of the United States, pursuant to Resolution 217, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in Committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the previous question is orderd.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the Rees amendment, as amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment; if not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment upon which a separate vote has been demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLER as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. REES of Kansas, as amended by the amendment offered by Mr. NICHOLS: On page 2, line 9, after section 2, insert "(a)", and after line 25, insert the following:

"(b) Notwithstanding any of the provisions of subsection (2), no person shall be covered into the civil service, appointed, transferred, or promoted to any position covered into the classified civil service under the provisions of section 1 of this act, if such a person is from a State whose quota of positions in the classified civil service is more than filled, unless and until the quota of all States whose quota of positions in the classified service is unfilled has become filled. As used in this section, the term "State" includes a Territory and the District of Columbia."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the House divided, and there were—ayes 141, noes 56.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-two Members have arisen, not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentlewoman opposed to the bill?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Civil Service with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: At the end of page 2 add the following: "Provided further, That no such incumbent shall continue to have a classified status after January 1, 1941, unless he shall have passed an open competitive examination for such position and have been appointed in accordance with the Civil Service Act and rules."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 112, nays 213, answered "present" 2, not voting 95, as follows:

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise at this late hour, not because I want to but because I have to. It is necessary for me to take the floor at this time rather than wait until Monday, because by then this matter will have become cold. I hope at least the press will carry my side of the controversy that was raised yesterday by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE]. I regret exceedingly he is not here, although I told him this afternoon I would seek time today in order to answer him. I understand he had to leave because of an important engagement.

It has come to pass now, in Washington, that it is very dangerous to accept invitations to meet with our colleagues because you might be charged with engaging in a subversive plot. In fact, it has become so dangerous to accept invitations that when one receives an inviation from even the White House one accepts with a great deal of trepidation because some Member of the House, acting as a Sherlock Holmes, may investigate, explode it, and give it certain implications that are nonexistent.

In this particular case I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE], acting as a Sherlock Holmes, and playing detective in this matter, made an error in his findings, because his statement, contained on page 1237 of the RECORD, is based on a distortion of facts and a distortion of the truth.

I would like to take up, item for item, what has been said in his speech.

First he stated:

I believe it is to the everlasting credit of the Senators and Representatives who were invited to this meeting that, with the exception of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], those who did express themselves at this meeting, I know authoritatively, went on record definitely against the infiltration of the Young Communist League into the American Youth Congress.

That statement is doubly untrue. First of all, there was no question of any infiltration of the Young Communist League into the American Youth Congress. The subject of the discussion was simply whether or not, now that the Young Communist League is and has been in the American Youth Congress, the American Youth Congress should expel these young people. I took the position then, which I have always taken publicly, that the American Youth Congress is modeled along the lines of our American Government. Its structure is based on the Bill of Rights and that Bill of Rights has no ifs and buts in it. The American Youth Congress is entirely within its rights and in keeping with the best American traditions in putting into practice the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of the United States of America.

Secondly, the statement is again incorrect and untrue because I was not the only one who took this position that night. I am not going to mention any names, because it is not my practice to mention names. There are Members on the floor of the House this evening who can speak for themselves. I am sure there were at least four, if not more, who took the same position I did that night at the White House with reference to the American Youth Congress and with reference to the statement I have just made.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUNN. I was one of those men who were present and I made a statement on the floor this afternoon. I am going to continue to make that statement the balance of my life.

Mr. GEYER of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. GEYER of California. I was also there and I agree absolutely with what the gentleman has said so far. I certainly express myself as agreeing with the First Lady of the Land as to what she had to say.

Mr. McGRANERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McGRANERY. I concur in what the gentleman has said with respect to what transpired there. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE], if he were doing a Sherlock Holmes job——

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that the gentleman cannot refer to a Member of the House in that way.

Mr. McGRANERY. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] did a very poor job of Sherlock Holmesing. If he was there to report or to investigate the happenings of that meeting, he has made a mistake, because he has included the names of two of my colleagues from the State of Pennsylvania who were not there. He has included others who were not there.

So far as I noticed in the RECORD—I was not here when he spoke yesterday—he included the majority leader of this House, who was not there. So that, I take it, is an irresponsible statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin without having had knowledge of what actually transpired at that time. The gentleman from New York has stated exactly the position taken at that meeting. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker—and I shall not object to the extension at this time—may I say that we have had a long day and I shall object to any other Member addressing the House after the gentleman from New York concludes his statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAYBURN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I am not going to defend Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt. She does not need any defense from me. In my opinion she is a person who has earned a great place in the history of America. She is the First Lady of the Land not only by virtue of being the wife of the President of the United States but, in my opinion, she is the First Lady of the Land in fact because of her deeds, because of her courageous Americanism, and, above all, because of her lack of demagoguery.

With regard to these young people here, why raise a "red" scare? Only a very small portion of that membership happens to belong to the Communist Party. They have come here with a program; they have come here with an appeal, and what do we find? The same old reactionary tactics—a "red" smokescreen is raised in order to conceal the real issues that are presented by these young people. There are 4,700,000 of them unemployed; what are you going to do for them. They come here with a program of peace, jobs, and civil liberties. What answer does Congress give? A solution? No; a "red" scare.

I am sick and tired of people setting themselves up as self-constituted paragons of Americanism. The same brand of Americanism which in 1929 offered red apples to American youth to sell is now offering a "red" scare to American youth to execute. I say it is shameful, whether the person who attacks this Youth Congress be a Republican or a Democrat, whether he be chairman of a national committee or not, to try to hide the real issues that are raised by American youth with a "red" scare. Give American youth jobs, give them an American opportunity, guarantee the peace of our country, and you will not have to fear any "isms" nor will you have to fear any attacks on our fundamental institutions. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAYBURN].

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Strong Son of God, who dost share the world's burden and pain, create and make in us new and contrite hearts.

It nobly becomes us in increasing reverence to preserve the memory of the heroes and martyrs who have made possible our national greatness. By common impulse we wait at the altar of prayer and supplication in memory of an immortal public servant whose labors and character will remain undimmed, vital in courage, and vibrant in inspiration for all time. As he reached the heights of truth and integrity, he left those footprints that will live forever in the annals of human endeavor. We praise Thee that he touched the wilderness cabin and took away its curse; he touched poverty and blessed it with simple yet beautful humanity; he sauntered along the woodland's lanes and turned them into a college of wisdom. O God, grant that his spirit may live and be the inspiration of future generations; may it live as the master architect of our expanding Republic; may it live in the songs of the toilers as they vision a glorious future; may it live world-wide as prophet, priest, and king; may it live until not a human foot in all the earth shall walk with bowed head beneath a tyrant's heel. In the name of the Christ, our Elder Brother. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 9, 1940, was read and approved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Allow the Chair to make a brief statement. This being Lincoln's birthday, the Chair thinks it would be appropriate first to recognize Members who desire to say a word about his life, character, and public service.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH].

LINCOLN, OF ILLINOIS

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, no man made great by death offers more hope to lowly pride than does Abraham Lincoln, for while living he was himself so simple as often to be dubbed a fool. Foolish he was, they said, in losing his youthful heart to a grave and living his life on married patience; foolish in pitting his homely ignorance against Douglas, brilliant, courtly, and urbane; foolish in setting himself to do the right in a world where the day goes mostly to the strong; foolish in dreaming of freedom for a long-suffering folk whom the North was as anxious to keep out as the South was to keep down; foolish in choosing the silent Grant to lead to victory the hesitant armies of the North; foolish, finally, in presuming that government for the people must be government of and by the people.

Foolish, many said; foolish, many, many believed.

This Lincoln, whom so many living friends and foes alike deemed foolish, hid his bitterness in laughter, fed his sympathy on solitude, and met recurring disaster with whimsicality to muffle the murmur of a bleeding heart. Out of the tragic sense of life he pitied where others blamed, bowed his own shoulders with the woes of the weak, endured humanely his little day of chance power, and won through death what life disdains to bestow upon such simple souls—lasting peace and everlasting glory.

How prudently we proud men compete for nameless graves, while now and then some starveling of Fate forgets himself into immortality.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER].

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, on the one hundred and thirty-first anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln we rejoice to see the world still at the feet of our great hero and martyr. It speaks worlds for his fame that friend and foe revere him.

The State of Kansas has always idolized him, for the same tragedy that made Kansas a free State placed Lincoln among the immortals.

It is little known that just before destiny embraced him, Abraham Lincoln spent a week in Kansas. Lincoln had a cousin, Mark Delahay, living and practicing law in Leavenworth, who in conjunction with Col. D. R. Anthony, the brother of Susan B. Anthony and father of our late colleague, Hon. Daniel Anthony, persuaded Mr. Lincoln to come out to Kansas and deliver several speeches in the Territory of Kansas.

The Hannibal and St. Joe railroad had just been completed, so Lincoln came over from Springfield to Hannibal, thence to St. Joseph on the new railroad. Mr. Web Wilder, a Kansas historian of the early times, met Lincoln at St. Joe, took him across the Missouri River in a skiff into Kansas, and thence to Atchison, Kans., where he spoke first. There was not a foot of railroad in Kansas at that time. The next night he spoke at Troy, the county seat of Doniphan County. The night of December 1, 1859, he spoke in Leavenworth in a small room, but only about 200 could get in and it was such a great speech that Anthony and Wilder decided that all the people of Leavenworth must hear him on the 3d since he was to speak at Doniphan the night of December 2, upon which date John Brown was hung at Charlestown, Va., now West Virginia.

On the afternoon of December 2, Wilder drove with Lincoln to Doniphan in an open carriage, which is still preserved at Leavenworth. On that cold afternoon Wilder froze his right hand driving as it was the coldest first week in December ever known in Kansas. As they drove over the prairie they met a man driving a team of mules with a load of buffalo robes, which were very common at that time. When the driver of the mules discovered Mr. Lincoln in the carriage he exclaimed, "My God, Lincoln, you are the last man in the world I would have looked for in the wilderness!" Lincoln untangled his long legs from the surrey in which he was riding, got out on the ground to meet the man, and after looking down into the bewhiskered face, replied, "Why Henry Villard!" It was Henry Villard, who had been with Lincoln and Douglas in their debates in the fall of 1858. James Gordon Bennett, of the New York Herald, had sent Villard overland to investigate the gold rush at Leadville, Colo., and Villard was on his way back via Fort Leavenworth.

Villard saw that Mr. Lincoln was very cold, so he gave him two buffalo robes and told him that if he did not bring them back to Leavenworth the next morning he would never again be "Honest Abe."

Colonel Anthony and Mr. Wilder, finding no adequate room, decided to have Lincoln speak from the front of the old Planters Hotel. Before the meeting a German brewer at Leavenworth brought a pitcher of a new kind of beer he had invented for Mr. Lincoln, who took a swallow and made a wry face. The D. A. R. still preserve this pitcher at Leavenworth. Villard wired the New York Herald that this was the greatest mass meeting ever held in Kansas and the greatest speech he ever heard. About 2 months thereafter the New York Tribune came to Leavenworth with Lincoln's Cooper Union speech, which, with the Brady photograph taken at the same time, was said to have secured the Republican nomination of Lincoln in 1860 at Chicago. It was the same speech that Lincoln had delivered in front of the Planters Hotel, so the old brewer claimed his beer inspired the speech that nominated Lincoln for President.

At Leavenworth Lincoln was told of the hanging of John Brown. Lincoln disapproved of Brown's methods at Harpers Ferry, for he had a high regard for law and order. He shared Brown's abhorrence of human slavery but disavowed his method of taking the law into his own hands.

But it is a long way from the Lincoln of 1859 to the Lincoln who sits enshrined in the marble palace on the Potomac where a grateful people have memorialized him as the Great Emancipator. [Applause.]

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, Abraham Lincoln is revered by liberty-loving people throughout the world, but we of Illinois especially cherish his memory because of his many years of close and intimate association with the history of our great State.

Twenty-three years ago today my father, Burnett M. Chiperfield, then a Member of this body from the State of Illinois at large, gave an address on Abraham Lincoln. Again on February 12, 1932, as Representative of the Fifteenth Illinois District, which I now have the honor to represent, he addressed the House on the subject of the Great Emancipator.

My father has studied the life and activities of the martyred President for a period of 40 years. Because of his greater familiarity with the subject, I would like to follow in my father's footsteps sufficiently to incorporate in the RECORD certain extracts from these speeches. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks at this point and to include therein extracts from the speeches just referred to:

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. Speaker, many years have come and gone since the earth last saw the beloved form of the Great Emancipator.

Although now they almost equal in number the allotted span of the life of a man, not a single laurel that was placed upon his brow by the loving hands of a grateful people has been withered and not one has faded under the destroying hand of time.

The passage of the years has but added to the freshness and luster of those laurels, and his memory has become the more fixed and established, until today we again gather in reverence to do homage to the deeds and achievements of one of the Nation's greatest—Abraham Lincoln.

In the State from which I come, as well as in the other Commonwealths of the Nation, his greatness is not forgotten, nor are the deeds which he performed lost to remembrance, nor is their glory lessened; and though he has long since passed to the glorious company of the immortals, yet in truth he now lives and speaks wherever the thought of liberty finds lodgment in the mind of man.

As the gray twilight brings the day to a close on the broad prairies of Illinois, mothers draw their little ones to their knees and tell in tones of affection o'er and o'er again the entrancing story of the life of this great man. And as the tale holds the youthful listeners spellbound, they do not dwell on the battles of years gone by, but speak they rather of his humble origin, of the devoted mother who guided his childish steps, of the struggling youth, the sturdy and determined manhood, and the just and loving heart that found vast expression in the beneficent life that gave to us a most precious legacy—the memory of one of the greatest and most-loved men since the days of the Saviour of the world—the memory of the humble rail splitter of the prairies of Illinois. [Applause.]

Others may speak of Lincoln the leader, the statesman, the President, but I speak this day of Lincoln the humane, of Lincoln the man, and the life that has endeared him to all liberty-loving citizens of the world.

From the humility of his origin, the hardships and privations of his youth, the sorrows and sympathies of his maturer years, the disappointments and triumphs of his life, out of the wisdom that he acquired in this harsh school of adversity came one who was recognized by the people of his time and class as a comrade, a companion, and a friend; one with whom even yet today we can walk in the same intimate, close, and tender association.

At this day we cannot understand the severity of the struggles by which he rose or the bleak barrenness of his life, which he describes as "the short and simple annals of the poor." In after years he could not bear to speak of those days, and so far as his words are concerned they are a sealed book.

In all the length and breadth of the land today there is not poverty such as he knew. It is not accurate for men to say that his life was the common lot of the sturdy pioneer of those days, for this is not correct.

Why, I cannot tell, but so it is, that when a vast work in the affairs of nations is to be accomplished and a great man is required, the early scenes of his life are almost invariably laid amidst the humblest surroundings and in homes where love has supplied the greater part of the needs of childhood days. It was so with Gideon, David, Luther, Garfield, Webster, Grant, Edison, and many others, and so it was, although to a much greater degree, with Lincoln.

Reared in a cabin that was inferior to the shelter of the animals on the farm, housed in a structure that was for a long time without windows, doors, or a floor, and that was not even enclosed on all four of its sides, here his early years were spent. The furnishings, meager and cruelly crude, were hardly worthy of the name; his resting place was a bed of leaves laid upon a rude support of poles. Here dwelt and developed the indomitable spirit of the lad who, while his heart was ofttimes saddened, though not embittered, by the privations he experienced and the hardships he endured, suffered not his courage to fail.

Here it was that he learned the vast sympathy and the broad affection for his fellow man that a mansion or a palace does not seem to favor or create.

The church wisely reverences the humble cradle and abode of the Saviour, and the American people find inspiration in the life of the youth who, as from a chrysalis, outgrows his humble surroundings and emerges triumphant with a character glorious and beautiful.

And so the lad of poverty triumphed until at his death the world stood silent and the monarchs of the earth bowed their heads in grief and laid their tributes upon his bier as he made his last journey, silent and still, by night and by day, through the unbroken ranks of sorrowing citizens, to the old home in the heart of Illinois, where now his sacred dust reposes, a precious trust of the people of that State. [Applause.]

Between the humble home and the last imposing spectacle lay a life of love, devotion, and service. In it all is not found one day of selfish ease or idle self-indulgence. No anchorite ever lived more humbly or toiled more vigorously to attain the goal that was to be his.

To me it is a delight and a privilege to trace in imagination his triumphant, though weary, steps.

Love and service, attended with the highest devotion to duty, marked his course. His guide and counselor in those days of privation was a wonderful mother, whom he loved with all the devotion of his boyish heart, and of whom he said, "All that I am or ever hope to be I owe to my angel mother." When the summons came to the rude hut and called her from earth away, it left the lad bereft and alone, and none could bring him comfort.

It was the first staggering blow to a life that already well knew sorrow.

Father and son with their own hands hewed out the rude casket, and, winding her in her humble shroud, laid her away forever from the sight of man, to await that glorious day of awakening when, instead of being one of the humblest of the earth, she would be welcomed to the life beyond as the heroic mother of one of the world's noblest. [Applause.]

Denoting the steadfastness of his devotion and purpose and the strength of his affection, the lad grieved day by day because no words of consolation and benediction had been spoken over the last resting place of his loved one, until, learning that a man of God was at a distant point, months afterward, he trudged his weary way over hill and dale and through the lonely forest that the mother might have Christian burial and gladly brought to her grave a holy man to perform the last rites and there speak the words that brought comfort and peace to his heart.

As the Virgin Mother of God is remembered by the faithful, so is lovingly adored by the people of the land the mother of Abraham Lincoln; and in the vision of all mothers who toil and struggle in sacrifice, through poverty and hardship, that their children may start the world aright, she stands as a patron saint, a guiding light, and a glorious inspiration. [Applause.]

The struggles of his boyhood days and their biting poverty left a melancholy impress on his mind and soul.

They gave to him for his entire lifetime the sensitive heart of a child.

He could see no wrong done or hurt come to any living thing without himself being hurt.

He sorrowed with the sorrowful, and his tears fell with those who had been wounded and broken on the march of life.

His soul responded to the sufferings of the world.

Through his bitter experiences no man could better understand than he the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, and this sympathetic comprehension animated and guided his every act.

In all the record of his life no mean deed is written, and in the story of his career, as orally preserved by tradition in the State from which I come, there does not remain even the suggestion that he was capable of a selfish or unworthy act.

As only a starved soul could yearn, he desired affection, and when this was given to him by Anne Rutledge it was returned with an ardor that was great. Many say that Anne Rutledge is a myth. I have visited her grave near the town of old Salem, where it is said that after her death Lincoln came often in sadness, and would not be consoled. It is repeated that at one of these times he said that the true inscription for her resting place should be, "Here lies the body of Anne Rutledge and the heart of Abraham Lincoln."

Ofttimes he was oppressed with grief, and for days he would seem to be crushed by it. At such a time he once said:

"I am now the most miserable man living. If what I feel were distributed among the whole human family, there would not be a cheerful face on earth. Whether I shall ever be better, I cannot tell. I awfully forbode I shall not. To remain as I am is impossible; I must die or be better, it seems to me."

With his sensitive nature he sought the love of those with whom he was brought in contact. Their esteem and good opinion sustained, encouraged, and supported him. Without it he was cast down and disheartened. His reward—and the only one he sought—was the approval of his countrymen. And in later years the knowledge that he was at variance with a great section of the land caused him the most poignant grief.

It is worthy of much comment that although Lincoln—as he states—had the advantage of only 6 months of school and no opportunity for what is sometimes called higher education, yet he was a man of great and profound knowledge.

Perhaps not widely versed in the details of the arts or sciences, yet he knew men. He knew their thoughts and minds and souls and the motives which animated them. He knew their strength and their weakness. He was brother and father to all mankind, and knew their sorrows and their trials. To them he could speak in simple words that touched their deepest sensibilities, and could play upon the chords of their emotion in language plain, it is true, but with words that lived and breathed; in language that stands to this day as an unparalleled example of literary style.

If you ask where he attained this power, the answer, it seems to me, is easy to give. He and his forbears were born amid surroundings where life was stern and where each day was an actual struggle for existence. Under these conditions speech was as plain as the method of life. There they employed the good old Anglo-Saxon of a century past. They stripped from their meager vocabulary all effete and soft words and left remaining only those that were strong and vigorous, and of these they did not employ many.

The Bible was almost the only book, and its influence upon their speech was marked. Lincoln used words that were dynamic in their vigor. The addition of a syllable to a sentence was to him a matter of profligacy.

Each phrase was cut to the last degree, and thought was given expression in sentences that were strong, direct, and filled with meaning.

Lincoln used the monosyllable whenever possible, and his sentences ofttimes were almost entirely made up of these elementary words. When he spoke to the people in these simple terms they listened to him gladly, as they did in days of yore to the Man of Galilee, whose words were also plain and touched the hearts of all.

In this simple style Lincoln said: "I am not bound to win, but I am bound to be true. I am not bound to succeed, but I am bound to live up to what light I have. I must stand with anybody that stands right; stand with him while he is right, and part with him when he is wrong."

And so, again, they were employed by him in making this prediction: "The mystic chords of memory stretching from every battlefield and every patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone will yet swell the chorus of the Union when again touched, as they will surely be, by the better angels of our nature." [Applause.]

And it was in these same words of common speech that he astonished and charmed the world when in their marvelous beauty he paid his tribute on the field of Gettysburg to the men of the land who had given their lives that the Nation might live forever. This famous speech consisted of about 300 words. Of these, 204 were words of 1 syllable.

In all of his preparation for his life work he was thorough and painstaking to the last degree. One day he was confronted with the word "demonstrate." Asking himself what it was to demonstrate, he went to his dictionary and saw that its meaning was "to make clear." He asked himself the question whether he could demonstrate and "make clear," and his answer was that he could not. Thereupon he laid aside the study of law, upon which he had commenced some months before, and took up the study of Euclid, and did not again return to the law until he had mastered the first five books of Euclid's great work.

So it was in all his acts.

Thoroughness was his rule, and upon this solid basis did he build his life.

The path that Lincoln traversed in public life was not an easy one. Probably no man who ever attained great prominence has tasted as bitterly of defeat as did he.

In 1832 he was defeated for a seat in the Legislature of Illinois.

In 1848 he was defeated for renomination to Congress, to his great discouragement.

It then seemed to him, and so he said, that he believed that his public career was forever ended and that there was to be no further public service for him.

In 1849 he was a candidate for Commissioner of the General Land Office, but was defeated because Daniel Webster cast his influence in favor of another candidate.

In 1854 he was a candidate for United States Senator, but after a time withdrew in favor of Judge Trumbull.

In 1856 he was a candidate for Vice President, but was not named by the convention.

At that time he said:

"I have the cottage at Springfield and about $8,000 in money. If they make me Vice President with Seward, as some say they will, I hope I shall be able to increase it to $20,000, and that is as much as any man ought to want."

In 1858 he was a candidate for the Senate of the United States, but was defeated by Judge Douglas, although he carried the popular vote of the State by 4,000.

His was a brave and indomitable heart.

He was not dismayed or crushed by these successive defeats, although his campaigns were made at a great sacrifice.

* * * * * * *

And after the long struggle came the great victory, and he sat in the seat of the mighty.

But this did not change a single fiber of his kindly nature. The mountain crest meant no more to him than the lowly valley.

When power came and greatness was his, he wore his honors modestly, without arrogance or ostentation, and humility and kindness marked his course.

He was to the Nation Father Abraham, and with meekness and might, affection and care, he led his children through the valley of the shadow safely into the fold of peace and tranquillity. [Applause.]

No greater tribute can be paid to the wisdom and worth of the opinion of Lincoln than is paid today by those who use him and his words as the final and supreme argument in favor of some proposed plan or movement.

It is demonstration to the minds of many when it can be said "Lincoln favored these things."

But while the tribute is great, the name of Lincoln is not always worthily employed.

Those who seek to destroy and break down the vital principles of our Government do not hesitate to invoke his name as an aid in the accomplishment of that purpose.

By the frenzied orator of the curb, who inveighs against all government, his auditors are told that Lincoln stood for absolute freedom of thought and action and that he had no regard for the limitations of law.

They are not told, however, that Lincoln stood for freedom of speech and action only under the Constitution and the law. [Applause.] They are not told that in speaking of this freedom of speech he said:

"Yes; we will speak for freedom and against slavery as long as the Constitution of our country guarantees free speech, until everywhere in this wide land the sun shall shine and the rain shall fall and the winds shall blow upon no man who goes forth to unrequited toil."

The things for which he stood and which he attempted to do were in the name of the Constitution, and to this instrument, as he construed it, he was wholly devoted.

The reckless and harebrained experiment in government possessed no attraction for him, nor was he inclined to adopt a plan merely because it was new and untried, but going hand in hand with his conservatism was the ever-present desire to so adapt the Constitution that it would respond to the changing needs and requirements of the people. [Applause.]

While regarding with reverence the precedents of the past, he also sought to be acutely conscious of, and responsive to, the economic demands and needs of the present.

As he was intensely human in all his aspects of life, so did he make a sympathetic and human interpretation of the Constitution where the rights of men were involved, which, while not always strict or entirely logical, still made for the uplifting and the welfare of the people of the land.

With such a construction of the Constitution of the United States by those in power the people of the Nation will not quarrel. It is radical changes in our forms of government not authorized by the Constitution that will be met with condemnation.

Those who find comfort in the denial of a God, or of a Supreme Being, frequently claim Lincoln as one who shared their views and approved their lack of belief.

No greater or more foul slander could be uttered against this man.

Lincoln walked hand in hand with God for many years before his death, and there is no act of his life that warrants the claims so advanced against him.

It may be that he could not define a particular creed that entirely and closely fitted his views, but his steadfast belief in a God and His divine power to guide and shape the affairs of men was touching.

There is hardly an utterance of Lincoln that has been preserved that does not speak of this belief and faith.

* * * * * * *

His state papers are filled with appeals to God and statements of his belief in a Supreme Being and of his reliance upon his aid and assistance.

His trusting faith was like that of a little child who confidingly puts his hand in that of a loving father and walks the path with a sublime trust and without fear.

One cannot fail to be impressed with the startling fact that the entire achievement of the life of Abraham Lincoln, that has caused the generations to remember him, was accomplished and performed in barely 1,500 days.

If from his life were taken the actions and deeds embraced in those days, his name would barely be known outside of the counties of Illinois where his activities had been.

When defeated for the Senate by Douglas it seemed to the doubting many that his career was done; but the defeats of the past were to him only the foundations on which he builded his future triumph.

His trials and struggles and sorrows had refined his soul until the dross was gone, and out of his bitter experience came forth a man—apparently called of God—to guide the people of the land, both North and South, out of the horrors of war to the place where, rededicated by the blood of a hundred fields, they stood a united and invincible people. [Applause.]

One lesson taught by Lincoln that may be helpful in the present day was his unfaltering determination to stand steadfast before the nations of the world for the rights of America.

Although opposed by the bravest of the brave at home, he did not fail to speak courageously for the dignity of the country when it was assailed from abroad, and in the overwhelming crisis of those days he spoke in the name of our Nation for the preservation and recognition of its fundamental rights.

Today we are in the midst of a great national crisis and confronted with and threatened by a world cataclysm which all pray may be averted.

It will be averted whenever the people of the Nation are sufficiently impressed with the importance of and need for united action.

The poet has told in inspiring lines of the response that the people of the land will make to such a situation, and it was no more true when penned than it is today.

This whole Nation will respond either in time of peace or time of war, by sacrifice and endeavor or by arms, and bear any hardship that may be imposed, no matter how severe, whenever danger assails the Republic. [Applause.]

In time of the Nation's need and peril truly it can be said:

"Up the hillside, down the glen,
Rouse the sleeping citizen;
Summon out the might of men:

"Like a lion growling low,
Like a night storm rising slow,
Like the tread of unseen foe.

"It is coming—it is nigh:
Stand your homes and altars by;
On your own free thresholds die.

"Clang the bells in all your spires;
On the gray hills of your sires
Fling to heaven your signal fires.

"O for God and duty stand,
Heart to heart and hand to hand,
Round the old graves of the land.

"Whoso shrinks or falters now,
Whoso to the yoke would bow,
Brand the craven on his brow.

"Freedom's soil hath only place
For a free and fearless race—
None for traitors false and base.

"Perish party, perish clan:
Strike together while ye can,
Like the arm of one strong man."

[Applause.]

How marvelously like the ministry of the Saviour of the world were the beneficient years of this great leader of men.

How like the passion of the Son of God was the martyrdom which he suffered, that all men might be free and, better yet, be free with the Nation united.

For him the zenith of his career had been reached, and, like Moses, he stood upon the height and viewed the land regenerated, but which he might not enter—and then, on Good Friday, the day when the Christian world was sorrowfully observing the crucifixion of the Christ, God took him, even though the evening of his life had not yet come, for his task was done.

Yea, he was taken, if it can be so said of the death of the clay that formed his body, but there was left the undying spirit of this great man to lead and protect the people of this Nation by the wisdom he displayed for many generations to come.

And then came ungrudgingly the belated acknowledgment of his greatness.

* * * * * * *

Great men have come and gone since Lincoln fell, and many have attained high places in the Nation, but seldom has one, even when his power was the greatest, attained the wonderful influence over the people of the land that has been manifested, and still continues to be manifested until this day, by the memory of Abraham Lincoln.

That influence has guided the Nation when the hand of living man has faltered, for being dead, yet he speaketh to the souls of men with power and conviction.

And so today, as a Representative of the State of Illinois, I pay a humble tribute to the life and work of her great son.

Into his hands the people gave all that was best and dearest. To him they entrusted the sacred honor of the Nation, and never did he fail that trust. In his death they honor him and preserve his memory.

In the hall of representatives at Springfield only two portraits are found.

On the one hand is that of Douglas, who in the hour of stress clasped hands with his old-time political opponent and who held up the arms of Lincoln as Aaron did those of his leader of old.

The place of Douglas is secure in the affections of the people of the Prairie State.

From the other side of the hall looks down the towering form of Abraham Lincoln, and there the people of the State come and stand with tearful eyes, gazing into the kindly face of this great man, and as they depart they take away an inspiration to discharge the duties of citizenship better and more fully.

Our State has taken his ashes, his fame, and his memory to its heart.

One it will guard, and the others it will proclaim until the Father of Waters no longer runs to the sea and until time is no more.

"Not without thy wondrous story,
Illinois, Illinois,
Can be writ the Nation's glory,
Illinois, Illinois,
On the record of thy years,
Abraham Lincoln's name appears,
Grant and Logan and our tears,
Illinois."

In one of the most beautiful parks in the city of Chicago stands a wonderful monument, erected to commemorate the life of this, one of the world's greatest men.

It is builded beside the vast inland sea, whose ceaseless surf sounds a requiem by night and by day.

The first rays of the rising sun rest upon it in rosy salutation, and here again they pause in benediction ere the night closes down.

To this spot the people come as they might to a shrine of freedom.

Here they pause and linger.

Here gather the poor, of whom Lincoln said:

"God must have loved them or else He would not have made so many of them."

At the base of the statue little children play.

Here kings and princes and rulers have sent their wreaths and floral tributes to be laid at the feet of the imposing figure that, motionless and silent, ever looks toward the great city.

In loving remembrance this memorial has been builded by the people of Illinois to honor its first citizen, Abraham Lincoln, the martyred President.

On its base, chiseled deep into the lasting granite, is one of the greatest sentences in the English language, and from its perusal we can gain the secret of the power and see the faith that animated Lincoln and gave him the courage to perform his task.

In that sentence may be found a motto by which any man can live and that can be adopted by a nation as its rule of action in its hour of need.

These are his words, noble and courageous:

"Let us have faith to believe that right makes might, and firm in that conviction let us to the end dare to do our duty as God gives us to see it."

Words of mine can add nothing to the veneration in which this wonderful character is held by the people of the land, both North and South.

He is loved and revered, and his fame grows more secure as the generations pass.

[Prolonged applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. Speaker, may I conclude with a quotation by Lincoln which was not included in the address of my father. This quotation, in my opinion, epitomizes the life and character of Lincoln better than any mere words of mine. It is the famous address he made when he left Springfield for Washington to become President of our country:

My friends, no one not in my situation can appreciate my feeling of sadness at this parting. To this place, to the kindness of these people, I owe everything; here I have been a quarter of a century and have passed from a young man to an old man. Here my children have been born and one is buried. I now leave, not knowing when or whether I ever may return, to a task before me greater than that which rested on Washington. Without the assistance of that Divine Being who ever attended him I cannot succeed; with this assistance I cannot fail. Trusting in Him who can go with me and remain with you and be everywhere for good, let us confidently hope that all will yet be well. In that same Almighty Being I place my reliance for support, and I hope you, my friends, will all pray that I may receive that divine assistance without which I cannot succeed, but with which success is certain. To His care I am commending you, as I hope, in your prayers, you will commend me. I bid you an affectionate farewell.

[Applause.]

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, there is a message that Abraham Lincoln gave to the people of Illinois on March 4, 1843, which we should all remember. I quote from what he said:

The question of revenue we will now briefly consider. For several years past the revenues of the Government have been unequal to its expenditures; and consequently, loan after loan, sometimes direct and sometimes indirect in form, has been resorted to. By this means a new national debt has been created, and is still growing on us with a rapidity fearful to contemplate—a rapidity only reasonably to be expected in time of war. This state of things has been produced by prevailing unwillingness either to increase the tariff or to resort to direct taxation. But the one or the other must come. Coming expenditures must be met, and the present debt must be paid; and money cannot always be borrowed for these objects. The system of loans is but temporary in its nature and must soon explode. It is a system not only ruinous while it lasts but one that must soon fail and leave us destitute. As an individual who undertakes to live by borrowing soon finds his original means devoured by interest, and, next, no one left to borrow from, so must it be with a government.

[Applause.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker—

Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new Nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that Nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that Nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, that is the greatest speech that Mr. Lincoln ever delivered, and if we all live up to the ideals and the sentiments expressed in that Gettysburg Address, we shall have done our duty as well. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF HOUSE

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Military Affairs Committee be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House on Tuesday and Wednesday of this week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, during the last several weeks the House Military Affairs Committee has been conducting hearings on all of the bills before the committee relating to the question of tax replacement for the Tennessee Valley Authority. Tomorrow, Tuesday, the committee will be dealing with matters of national defense. I have set aside Wednesday for the convenience of Members of the House and of the Senate who desire to be heard upon the subject of replacement of taxes that have been taken out of the revenues of the State of Tennessee and other States by reason of the sale of public utilities. I am making this statement to give notice to such of my colleagues as may desire to appear, and for their convenience.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman mean that the States of Alabama and Tennessee want the Federal Government now to pay them for taxes that they are going to lose because of the fact that they have the advantage of the Tennessee Valley Authority, when they are getting 5 percent of the gross revenues?

Mr. MAY. That is the principal issue involved, but there are a number of other issues with which the committee is trying to deal honestly and fairly. A great many questions are involved, and that is the reason I want to hear the Members of Congress from that section. I hope my colleagues from the States affected will take notice of this announcement of hearings on Wednesday and be prepared to make their statements, so that the hearings may be closed and the committee may finally dispose of the matter.

SECOND ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1955) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to delegate certain regulatory functions, and to create the position of Second Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, with House amendments, insist on the amendments of the House, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Mr. JONES of Texas, Mr. FULMER, and Mr. HOPE.

NATIONAL YOUTH CONGRESS

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include a short news item from the Washington Times-Herald of February 10.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I know of no more appropriate time than Lincoln's birthday to direct the attention of this House to the fact that the National Youth Congress has been in session and the further significant fact that they have been entertained at the White House and the President of the United States delivered an address to them. I commend to that group the life story and history of Abraham Lincoln, and if they will follow in his footsteps they will have a good guide.

RUSSIAN ATTACK ON FINLAND

Mr. Speaker, under date of February 10—and this is really the purpose of my remarks today—the President of the United States directed attention to the Russian attack on Finland. I now direct your attention to the fact that the Congress of the United States up to date has not passed legislation of a constructive nature that would be of aid to that Republic.

The news item to which I refer says:

President Roosevelt declared today that Soviet Russia is "a dictatorship as absolute as any other dictatorship in the world" and asserted United States sympathy is 98 percent with Finland in her resistance against Russia.

Mr. Roosevelt made his statement in an address to the American Youth Congress, which has been shot with controversy concerning its refusal to denounce the Russian invasion of Finland and charges of alleged Communist influence in its councils.

GIVES TALK IN RAIN

The President said the United States desired to aid Finland. He ridiculed suggestions that Russia might declare war on this country as a result of such aid.

The President described to the youth gathered in a drizzling rain outside the south portico of the White House his early interest in the Russian experiment and his hopes it would lead to betterment of the Russian Nation.

"That hope," he declared, "is today either shattered or put away in storage against a better day.

"The Soviet Union, as a matter of practical fact, known to you and known to all the world, is a dictatorship as absolute as any other dictatorship in the world. It has allied itself with another dictatorship and it has invaded a neighbor so infinitesimally small that it could do no injury to the Soviet Union, and seeks only to live at peace as a democracy, and as a liberal, forward-looking democracy at that."

WARNING ON SUBVERSION

Mr. Roosevelt conceded the right of young people or any Americans to "call yourselves Communists," but warned that "you have no American right, by act or deed of any kind, to subvert the Government and the Constitution of this Nation."

Mr. Roosevelt spoke to the 3,500 Youth Congress delegates after they had marched in the rain along Constitution Avenue, chanting their demand for jobs and youth opportunities just like a college football crowd pleading for a touchdown.

AID FINLAND NOW

Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to attack the agency of our Government that is charged with the conduct of our affairs with foreign countries. I do believe, however, that certain facts should be kept in mind and that our records should show those facts. I talk now about the delay in extending aid to Finland. Either the people of this country want to aid Finland or they want to permit Russia to carry on its brutal war of aggression. The administration should have some policy in connection with this problem and it should not be a policy of delay and there should not be so many differences of opinion as to prevent any effective aid if such aid is to be given at all.

I pointed out when Congress was in session on October 10, 1939, that Russia had evil designs on Finland and on the Scandinavian countries. I suggested at that time in some brief remarks in the House of Representatives that this Government should let Russia understand its sympathy for Finland and its hope that Russia would respect the rights of that little republic.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that our agency of government, charged with the responsibility of dealing with foreign affairs, should have made vigorous representations to Russia at that time before Russia started its brutal attack on Finland. I regret that a vigorous policy was not pursued by the administration. The world knows that communistic Russia launched a brutal attack on Finland shortly after my talk in the House of Representatives and that that battle has been going on for the past several weeks.

When Congress convened on January 3, 1940, I again pointed out the necessity of taking a position in connection with the Russian attack on Finland. I expressed the opinion at that time that aid should be extended to Finland not only in the way of a loan, not only in the way of supplying materials, but that if necessary airplanes and munitions of war should be furnished for the help of the little republic.

I said that the time to do this was on January 3, 1940, and not at some subsequent date. I felt then and I feel more strongly now, that when Russia started to march on Finland it was the case of the communistic theory of government on one hand attacking the civilized governments of the rest of the world. I felt then as I feel now, that there was only one position—and that the interests of the people of the United States were on the side of Christianity and civilization and that in every way possible communistic Russia should be told to leave the small countries of the world alone and that communistic Russia should not be permitted to force her theory of government upon countries that were too small to resist the power and tyranny of the despots in control in Russia.

I repeated these sentiments again in remarks found in the Appendix of the RECORD, page 319, where I again urged that a loan should be made to the Finnish Republic immediately and that that loan should be adequate for the purpose of helping Finland in the fight which Russia was waging against it. I pointed out then that the failure to help Finland meant that the safety of every small country of the world was at stake and that Norway, Sweden, and Denmark would suffer the same fate if communistic Russia were successful. I said at that time that in the fight against communistic Russia we had been one people; namely, we should aid those countries that were carrying on the battle to preserve civilization and Christianity for people who believed in our institutions and in our form of government.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that sentiment along the lines I have indicated is growing in the United States. This is not a question of politics but a question of determining our foreign policy for the benefit of America. My opinion is that thinking people everywhere are coming to this firm point of view. We had an example of this on the floor of the House in February when the membership of the House by a vote of 105 for, and a vote of 108 against, acted upon an amendment to an appropriation bill. The purpose of this amendment was to refuse to appropriate money to pay the salary of an American Ambassador at Moscow. The fact that the administration leaders were able to defeat this motion by a margin of only 3 votes is indeed significant. This vote was the method taken by the American people to serve notice on the administration, and all the world for that matter, that the United States of America has no sympathy for Russian communism and looks upon it as a menace to civilization and the greatest danger faced by the countries of the world.

I have no reluctance whatever in saying that I was one of the 105 Members to cast a vote which would amount to the same thing as a severance of diplomatic relations with Russia. I think the time has come to serve notice on the political despots in that great empire. They should be told now that the people of the United States resent every move they have made against little Finland, and every evil design they have against Finland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and other small countries of the world. We resent it because the time has come to call a halt in this Russian communistic claim to dominate the world.

Incidentally the facts disclosed by the Committee to Investigate Un-American Activities in the United States show clearly a link between communism in Russia and communism in the United States. I refer to reports of the Dies committee where evidence was presented that communistic Russia was carrying on a campaign in the United States of America directed at the very foundations of our Government. Financed by communistic Russia, this movement has indeed become a menace, and one of our domestic problems now has to do with this new doctrine of communism calling for the overthrow of the Government of the United States. May I suggest to the administration in this connection that it will soon become out of fashion to have key men in governmental positions who sympathize with communistic thought and tendencies and that the vast majority of the American people have no sympathy for this radical movement.

We can note with some pleasure the fact that other countries in the world are coming to the aid of Finland. I submit, however, that it is no credit to those who handle the foreign affairs of this country that there has been a failure up to date to publicly and vigorously take steps to loan money and furnish supplies to Finland in its battle for civilization and the ideals of our kind of government. I hope that those charged with the foreign affairs of this Government will wake up before it is too late, and I again urge upon the Congress of the United States and the executive branches of the Government the need to act now and act in 1941 along the lines I have indicated. Let us place the responsibility for this regrettable delay to furnish money and resources squarely upon the shoulders of those who express admiration for Finland and then refuse to take any practical steps to carry out the friendly gesture. If the administration has fear, I would like to encourage the leadership by saying that, in my opinion, this Congress by a vote of at least 2 to 1 would go on record to furnish to the Scandinavian countries money and resources to be used in the fight against communistic Russia. I also believe that now is the time to sever diplomatic relations with Russia and serve notice that the United States will vigorously oppose the policies of that country. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THOMAS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include a letter I received this morning dealing with reciprocal-trade treaties.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the life of the late Dr. John C. Fitzpatrick.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include a short editorial appearing in the New London Evening Day of February 10.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include therein a very able address delivered by Senator BRIDGES, at Muncie, Ind., on Friday, February 9.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, 7 long years ago this administration promised constitutional government, and do you know we have passed in those 7 years more than 100 laws granting power to the President, taking the power away from Congress? Do you know that we have passed laws granting power to the President whereby he can control radio stations; whereby he can control telegraph and telephone communication? He can control powerhouses, power lines, and dams. The President can control railways, water lines, bus and truck lines. He can control industrial establishments, if you refuse preference to Government contracts. The President can restrict production on farms. He can restrict the price of agricultural products. The President can manufacture goods by the Government in competition with private enterprise.

Now, since this administration will soon go out of power—and thank goodness for that—and we will have a Republican administration [laughter and applause], and we do not want to give any other President of the United States any such powers as this, I think it is time that we annulled those laws granting such unconstitutional powers to the President, because he can create business corporations. The President can further devaluate the dollar. The President can forbid the sale of stocks and bonds for 90 days and close the exchange. He can commandeer all silver; he now has all the gold buried in Kentucky; he can do too much. Our forefathers did not intend that power should be given the President. I say it is time to cancel and annul those laws granting him so much power. Do it now. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a statement on sugar which I have prepared and which was published in a national magazine.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE LATE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, in 1937 this House extended its privileges and courtesies to the then Governor General of Canada. Today this House, the country, and the whole world are shocked by his death. Lord Tweedsmuir was a distinguished diplomat, historian, and a great friend of our democracy. He was the author of some 53 books, and was probably one of the outstanding historians of the World War.

I can say, as Shakespeare said:

> He was a scholar, and a ripe and good one;
> Exceeding wise, fair-spoken, and persuading;
> Lofty and sour to them that loved him not,
> But to those men that sought him sweet as summer.

Mr. Speaker, in the passing of John Buchan, first Baron Tweedsmuir of Elsfield, King's Governor General of Canada since 1935, our sister sovereignty across the border has suffered an irreparable loss. Distinguished in letters, a popular novelist, an eminent historian, and an equally eminent biographer, he had added a new title—able diplomat.

That the Dominion cherished his presence and considered his efforts superlatively successful in his short diplomatic career ought to be enough for our admiration and our pausing. But beyond that amazing versatility of literary taste and practical aptitudes he combined a cosmopolitan nature that won all Americans who knew him and met him.

He was most helpful in formulating the recent Canadian trade treaties with us and wherever he went in these United States he made friends. Universities honored him and my own alma mater, Yale University, proudly conferred upon him the Doctor of Laws with this citation, which, if memory serves me, came from that inexhaustible captain of apt and descriptive compliments, Prof. William Lyon Phelps:

> Brilliant historian and biographer, beloved novelist, distinguished public servant, versatile as "Richard Hannay," reliable as "Mr. Standfast," representative of a commonwealth of free peoples whom we trust, your steps have been set in "the path of the King."

He visited this country formally in 1937. The White House entertained him. He had been most hospitable to our President on the occasion of the President's 1936 visit. We in that Congress heard him say as we honored him with our privileges and courtesies:

> I have always believed that the secrets of the future of civilization lie in the hands of the English-speaking people. I want these great Nations not only to speak the same language but think along the same lines, for that is the only true form of cooperation and friendship.
>
> I think that far too much is said about my country and yours being alike. It is much more important that they should be different. The strength of an alliance between two nations lies in the fact they should be complementary to each other and each give the other something new.

May we not say with his beloved Shakespeare:

> The elements were so mixed in him
> That Nature might well stand up and say to all the world
> "This was a man!"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address I gave last night at Cooper Union, New York. Although it exceeds two pages, I have an estimate from the Government Printing Office.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Are these the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. They are, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman does not have to have an estimate from the printer to cover an extension of his own remarks.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech delivered by me on January 23.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered over the Mutual network on February 10.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article from the Christian Science Monitor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE NATIONAL YOUTH CONGRESS

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker and Members, I rise to congratulate John Hamilton, the national Republican chairman, on his refusal to send a representative of the Republican Party to speak to the Youth Congress yesterday afternoon. It is my honor to be John Hamilton's Congressman.

Mrs. Lambertson and I went to the Labor Department auditorium yesterday at 2 p. m. and asked for admission in order to hear the arguments that I expected to hear presented in favor of the Murray bill. We stayed throughout the afternoon session, ate in the dining room with the group in the evening, and stayed for the night meeting. We were there 9 hours. During all that time I never heard one argument in favor of the bill which was emblazoned on all their badges. What I did hear more than anything else was a denunciation of England, France, one denunciation of Hitler by a Hebrew girl, but not one derogatory word for Joe Stalin. When the Loyalists of Spain were mentioned they raised the roof.

Everything that John Hamilton had said that was taken from the Dies investigation in his answer to the executive secretary in declining to send a representative was more than justified by what I heard and saw.

The youth were well behaved and bore the appearance of being bright young Americans, but to say that their leadership is saturated with communism is putting it mildly. I am as strongly against war as they are, and I am even against the loan to Finland, but for an entirely different reason. Apparently their opposition to the loan to Finland is because they love Russia.

I have not taken serious stock in other years in the warnings that the gentleman from New York, HAM FISH, and others have brought to the House on frequent occasions about the "red" propaganda in our land, but I was amazed and shocked yesterday as I saw these youth, 5,000 strong, gathered here from the Pacific to the Atlantic evidencing their sympathy for the Soviet Union. The Democratic Party was represented in the afternoon meeting by the national Democrat leader of the young women, and she appealed to them to stay within the Democratic Party, but got little enthusiasm from them; and then the chairman announced that Mr. Farley had sent his check for $50.

I say to these young people who here now fill our gallery and who have honored me with their hisses at the opening of these remarks, that the Republican Party offers the most hope for jobs in this land. Business has to supply these jobs eventually, and the Republican Party will unhalter business but will keep it regulated, and these jobs will be created like they used to be by business itself. As for peace, my party offers the best hope. The lifting of the embargo by this administration, the proposed loan to Finland, the sending of Sumner Welles now to the war zone are all steps in the direction of war. A victory of the Republican Party will do more to insure America's nonparticipation in this war than anything else, so on this anniversary of not only the great American but the first great Republican, Abraham Lincoln, I reiterate that I congratulate our national chairman for not sending a representative to a communistic-dominated Youth Congress. My party stands for jobs, for peace, and the preservation of democracy.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE NATIONAL YOUTH CONGRESS

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot recognize the gentleman to submit such a request. The Chair will recognize the gentleman to submit a request to address the House for 1 minute.

Mr. NICHOLS. I so modify my request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I have asked this time only because the gentleman from Kansas who preceded me injected to a limited extent, at least, partisan issues into the things that are being done by the National Youth Congress. As a member of the majority party I wish to take this opportunity to commend those forces in the National Youth Congress which have been attempting to expel from that organization those groups and individuals who admit communistic tendencies. It is my studied opinion, Mr. Speaker, that anyone who subscribes to communistic principles subscribes to the principle that our constitutional form of government in the United States should be overthrown.

It is also my studied judgment, Mr. Speaker, that organizations in the United States which want to be known and denominated as purely American should see that none of their branches, subsidiaries, or officers advocate or countenance communism or any other "ism" which implies an overthrow of our form of government. It is up to these organizations to purge themselves of groups or officials who may offend in this respect. They should take care or take the consequences. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

MEN ARE STILL SLAVES

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, what a farce, how childish it is, to come here, praise and pledge allegiance to the principles enunciated by Lincoln and followed throughout his political career, when we, by our acts, over a period of weeks, of months—yes, in fact, for more than 2 years—have failed to live up to and enforce those principles which we concede are essential if our Nation is to endure.

We have just listened to a recitation of the Gettysburg address. We have again been asked to pledge ourselves, to dedicate ourselves, to that duty which he so clearly pointed out when on that memorable occasion he said:

> That we here highly resolve that those dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

There is not a Member of this House who does not know that, if this Government is not to perish from the earth, free speech, a free press, and the liberty of the citizen must be preserved; and so, as each anniversary of Lincoln's birth rolls around, we render lip service to the ideals which beckoned him on; solemnly pledge each other to dedicate ourselves, to base our acts upon, the firm foundation stones of justice, equality, integrity, patriotism, on which he waged the fight for the preservation of our union, and faithfulness to which cost his life.

In the end, it was to make men free as well as to preserve the union that the war was carried on. Enslavement of men cost this Nation of ours 4 long years of bloody strife, untold suffering, the death of over 493,000 men. At the end of that war, the black man was free.

Today, regardless of color, of race, or creed, liberty and freedom to work is being taken from the citizens of this country and we, sworn representatives of the people, take no effective measures to prevent the destruction of the liberty of the citizen.

Do you challenge my statement? Then let me give to you this information from the press of yesterday—a news item dated February 9 from Toledo, Ohio.

This is not a statement from the much criticized Manufacturers' Association. It comes not from a chamber of commerce; an industrialist despised by the senior Senator from Wisconsin. It does not come from one who, by the Senate so-called Civil Liberties Committee, has been described as a "labor baiter." Nor is it the complaint of a politician. This information comes from a petition filed in a court at Toledo.

That petition was not filed by an employer. It was not filed by members of an independent union. It was not filed by nonunion men, opposing collective bargaining. It was not filed by men who are opposed to unions. It was filed by union men, by members of the A. F. of L. And what are they asking? They are asking for the same thing for which the Civil War was fought. They are asking for freedom. They are asking for freedom from those who have attempted by force to forge upon them shackles which would destroy their liberty of action; which would take from them the right to work, the right to support themselves and their families, until they have submitted to the dictation of a rival union.

Lincoln in his day had the privilege of splitting rails. He, without fear of molestation, might run a flatboat down the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers, and never be called upon to join some maritime or longshoremen's union. He had the privilege, as well as the right, of working in any place where he might find a job, for any man who chose to hire him. Today, the exercise of that God-given right, that right guaranteed by State and Federal Constitution, would be denied to Lincoln.

This petition to which reference was made was filed by American Federation of Labor unionists who had jobs at the plant of the Electric Autolite Co., asking the protection of the court from members of the C. I. O. who, they allege, unlawfully conspired together to bar the A. F. of L. workingmen from their jobs unless they joined the C. I. O.

The petition alleges that those belonging to the C. I. O. shot pieces of metal at the A. F. of L. members, spoiled their food, called them "rats" and "stool pigeons"; gathered together in gangs about machines, shut off the power, and finally ejected the A. F. of L. workers from the plant. All of this due, in part at least, because we have permitted to remain upon the statute books the unfair and unjust National Labor Relations Act.

How much longer will we, pledging allegiance to the principles of Lincoln, rendering lip service to our Constitution, boldly on the floor declaring that no one shall rob the least of our citizens of the protection guaranteed to him by the Federal Constitution, follow those fair words with inaction? Is it possible that we think that words alone will suffice? Do we fear an organized labor vote? Do we fear the political retaliation of a man who thinks that a paltry $470,000 entitles him to a Presidential decree granting him a license to plunder at will?

In Toledo there are workingmen, workingmen who are unionists, seeking the aid of the courts so that they may work. Let those in the halls of Congress, if they will not give protection to the unorganized, if they will not safeguard the liberties of those who belong to independent unions, come forward now and protect the members of a union, the A. F. of L., which for 50 years or more has been the voice of organized labor.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Does the gentleman think Lincoln could be the nominee of the Republicans today and be elected if he stood for the things he advocated in his day?

Mr. HOFFMAN. He certainly could not be the nominee of the New Deal party. He might be the nominee of a coalition of Republicans and conservative Democrats, to which my friend might well give aid and which would be honored by his support. And if the Republicans nominate a man who will abide by and follow in deed as well as in word the principles of our martyred Lincoln, he will be elected. [Applause.]

MINORITY VIEWS ON HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 470

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee may have permission to file their separate minority views on House Joint Resolution 407, which is the resolution dealing with reciprocal-trade treaties.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the Appendix of the RECORD a compilation of information on veterans' statistics furnished by the Veterans' Administration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUYER of Kansas asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of the legislative program in order for today, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BRYSON]?

There was no objection.

MOTION PICTURE—DRUNK WHILE DRIVING

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and as chairman of the subcommittee on traffic, I take this opportunity to invite every Member of the House, as well as the office force of every Member, to be present in the caucas room of the old House Office Building tomorrow afternoon at 2 o'clock, at which time there will be shown a moving picture entitled "Drunk While Driving." This picture will last about an hour and a half. It is a talking picture and has been made possible through the efforts of our very dear and personal friend and colleague the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. VREELAND] and Julius Brylawski, representing Warner Bros. theaters, who is also a close friend to practically everyone here. It is through Mr. Brylawski's generosity and cooperation that is making this possible. We want to be sure to have every Member of Congress present, as well as their office staff, tomorrow afternoon in the old House Office Building at the showing of this picture.

[Here the gavel fell.]

THE LATE THOMAS A. EDISON

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table and the conclusion of the legislative program, and after the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BRYSON] has concluded his address, I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes on the ninety-third anniversary of the birth of Thomas A. Edison, one who did more for struggling humanity than perhaps any other individual who has ever lived in all the tides of time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, with regard to the onslaught the gentleman from Michigan has been conducting against labor, particularly during this last session of Congress, I wonder if the gentleman from Michigan, being a good Republican in 1940, will go back and realize that Lincoln once did say:

> And still as an American I can say, thank God, that we do live under a system by which men have a right to strike.

I also wish to say with regard to the American Youth Congress and Lincoln that if Lincoln had been alive and had been around Washington these days he would not be throwing stones at these young people.

Instead of throwing stones, Lincoln would have been giving thought and action to the problem of 4,700,000 young people without work, and would do his utmost to provide them an American opportunity for a decent living and a fair education. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I believe if it were possible for Abraham Lincoln to be here with us today and have a substantial part in this Government, there would be no demand whatever for considering the need of any Youth Congress in America.

We speak about what Abraham Lincoln would do if he were here. Abraham Lincoln lived in the days when people still looked on black as black and white as white. He lived in a time when people still regarded the old principles that men have lived by for so many years as being honorable, just, and right. He believed in thrift, he believed in preserving savings, he believed in those principles that, if we had protected and followed them in this country, would have made conditions such that there would be no Youth Congress today.

BOARD OF VISITORS OF THE UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House the following communication from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 10, 1940.

The Honorable WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pursuant to the act of May 17, 1928 (U. S. C., title 10, sec. 1052–a), I have appointed, during the remainder of the third session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, the following members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House as members of the Board of Visitors of the United States Military Academy: Hon. A. J. MAY, Kentucky; Hon. R. EWING THOMASON, Texas; Hon. DOW W. HARTER, Ohio; Hon. CHARLES I. FADDIS, Pennsylvania; Hon. WALTER G. ANDREWS, New York; Hon. DEWEY SHORT, Missouri; and Hon. L. C. ARENDS, Illinois.

Very sincerely yours,

A. J. MAY, Chairman.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is District of Columbia Day. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH].

AMENDMENT OF SECTIONS 798 AND 800 OF THE CODE OF LAW FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (S. 186) to amend section 798 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to murder in the first degree. A similar House bill, H. R. 1807, has been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia and is on the calendar.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 798 of the act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1189), be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 798. Murder in the first degree: Whoever, being of sound memory and discretion, kills another purposely and either of deliberate and premeditated malice or by means of poison, or kills another in perpetrating or in attempting to perpetrate any offense punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, is guilty of murder in the first degree."

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. RANDOLPH: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That sections 798 and 800 of the act entitled 'An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia,' approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1189), be amended to read as follows:

" 'SEC. 798. Murder in the first degree: Whoever, being of sound memory and discretion, kills another purposely, either of deliberate and premeditated malice or by means of poison, or in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate any offense punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, or without purpose so to do, or kills another in perpetrating or in attempting to perpetrate any arson, as defined in section 820 or 821 of this code, rape, mayhem, robbery, or kidnaping, or in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate any housebreaking while armed with or using a dangerous weapon, is guilty of murder in the first degree.

" 'SEC. 800. Murder in the second degree: Whoever with malice aforethought, except as provided in the last two sections, kills another, is guilty of murder in the second degree.' "

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman explain just what this bill accomplishes?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the inquiry of the distinguished minority leader, may I state that the reason for this legislation is to clarify the use of the word "purposely" as it is used in the statute with respect to murder in the first degree. It has been necessary to clarify the language so as to render the word "purposely" solely a limitation on deliberate and premeditated homicides. I may say that this measure has the approval of the Bar Association of the District of Columbia, the Corporation Counsel of the District of Columbia, and the United States Department of Justice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend sections 798 and 800 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to murder in the first degree."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill, H. R. 1807, was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA REVENUE ACT OF 1939

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill, H. R. 8237, to amend the District of Columbia Revenue Act of 1939, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this merely to permit the payment of income tax in the District of Columbia in two installments?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes; and I think it might be well to make a brief explanation of the bill to the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I thought perhaps the gentleman might do that before we give permission to consider it in the House as in Committee.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I would be pleased to do that. This legislation will permit the residents of the District of Columbia to pay their income tax in two installments, one installment prior to or on April 15 and one prior to or on October 15, and if the returns are made on the basis of the fiscal year, one installment on the 15th of the fourth month and the other on the 15th of the tenth month.

Of course, we know that the Federal Government permits installment payment of Federal income tax, and I believe that a majority of the States makes similar provision for tax payments. It would work an undue hardship in many cases on the individual to have to pay the full amount in one payment, and we believe this legislation is fair and necessary.

In order that the District may have the benefit of this money to meet obligations, permission is given to the Secretary of the Treasury to advance funds to the District so that sufficient money will be available to meet the expenditures until the installment paid in October is received, at which time the Treasury would be reimbursed. Such an authorization is now in effect but it expires on June 30 of this year.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I am not going to object to considering the bill in the House as in Committee, and the gentleman, I am sure, will take care of the gentleman from Wisconsin who desires 5 minutes on the bill.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I shall be pleased to do that.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. In view of what we have read in reference to decisions of the corporation counsel relative to the existing revenue law, which decisions, unless something is done, will require some people working in the District of Columbia to pay three instead of two income-tax bills, it seems to me this bill is the proper place to offer an amendment to clarify that situation. However, I understand that the gentleman's committee in the very near future will bring in legislation that will so amend the law as to not require, for instance, a resident of my own State of Missouri, temporarily working and domiciled in the District, while employed here, to pay income tax to the Government, to the State of Missouri, and to the District of Columbia. In other words, so amend the law so that an individual who pays a tax to the State of which he is a legal resident will not be required to pay a tax to the District of Columbia. Is that correct?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I may say, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri, that the matters he brings up are certainly very pertinent to the local income-tax discussion. I appreciate the fact that he will not attempt to amend the legislation we are passing today. In the District of Columbia Committee meeting this morning these situations were discussed and we conferred with the corporation counsel. It is the desire of the committee to attempt speedily to bring in measures which will alleviate the inequalities with respect to payment of income tax in the District of Columbia in relation to the other States.

Mr. COCHRAN. In view of the explanation of the gentleman from West Virginia, I shall not offer an amendment to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we will have the same right to offer amendments in the House?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Then I shall not object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 18 of title II of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes", approved July 26, 1939, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. All returns of income for the preceding taxable year shall be made to the assessor on or before the 15th day of April in each year, except that such returns, if made on the basis of a fiscal year shall be made on or before the 15th day of the fourth month following the close of such fiscal year, unless such fiscal year has expired in the calendar year 1939 prior to the approval of this act, in which event returns shall be made on or before the 15th day of the third month following the approval of this act."

SEC. 2. Subsection (a) of section 26 of title II of said act approved July 26, 1939, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC 26. (a) Time of payment: One-half of the total amount of the tax imposed by this title shall be paid on the 15th day of April following the close of the calendar year and the remaining one-half of the tax shall be paid on the 15th day of October following the close of the calendar year, or, if the return be made on the basis of a fiscal year, then one-half of the total amount of the tax imposed by this title shall be paid on the 15th day of the fourth month following the close of the fiscal year and the remaining one-half of said tax shall be paid on the 15th day of the tenth month following the close of the fiscal year, except a fiscal year which expired in the calendar year 1939 prior to the approval of this act, in which event the tax shall be paid on the 15th day of the third month following the approval of this act."

SEC. 3. Title VI of said act approved July 26, 1939, is hereby amended by striking out "June 30, 1940" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "June 30, 1942."

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

I am heartily in favor of the purpose of this bill providing for semiannual payment of the tax. However, there is a great lack in the measure and I do not want the House to act upon it without fully understanding the implications involved.

There is no provision for any exemption in this bill for those veterans of wars who receive pensions, excluding such pensions from the income tax. In the act of 1935 this was specifically made an exemption. This bill will make it necessary, if we go ahead with it without further consideration, for every veteran who receives a pension to have it assessed as a part of his income.

While I am not objecting to this bill I do not like that part of the measure and I understand we are going to come in with another measure clarifying this situation. I want the House to fully realize that the veteran is penalized in this bill with respect to his income from a pension.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLLES. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Is it the understanding, then, that the pension or compensation received by a veteran from the Government, if he resides in the District of Columbia, is added to his regular income and is also subject to taxation?

Mr. BOLLES. It is, under this bill. If he gets $900 as a wage and $300 as a pension, he will pay on $1,200 as his income-tax basis.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLLES. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. We should amend this bill to give the veteran the same privilege in the District of Columbia that he now enjoys in the 48 States.

Mr. BOLLES. If we could do that on the floor, it would be acceptable to me.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOLLES. Yes.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. What is the Federal law on the subject of adding compensation and payments to veterans to their other income?

Mr. BOLLES. Under the Federal act there is no such condition. The veteran pension or benefit payment is exempted.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. They are exempt.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RANKIN: Page 2, after line 25, insert the following:

"SEC. 4. Section (b) of said act (relating to exclusions from gross income) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'(10) Payments of all benefits made to or on account of a beneficiary under any of the laws relating to veterans.'"

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from West Virginia accept that amendment?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposing the amendment. I merely want to say that the District of Columbia Committee realized at the time of the passage of the income-tax law that there were many changes which naturally would have to be made. The committee desired to take care of all of these amendments in a separate bill. We did discuss this morning the matter of benefits and compensations being exempted, but certainly I could not be put in the position of opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi at this time, although I would appreciate it much if we could handle it in the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Yes.

Mr. BOLLES. If we wait until the District of Columbia Committee acts—and it is true we discussed this matter this morning—and this law is passed without amendment, the assessments that would be made to be reported on March 15 would contain the veterans' compensation, which must be reported. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from West Virginia accept the amendment?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I gladly accept the amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS], let me say that we wrote the law so plainly that I did not think there was a lawyer in the District of Columbia who could misunderstand it.

The law which we wrote in 1935 provides:

Payment of benefits due or to become due shall not be assignable and such payments made to or on account of a beneficiary under laws relating to veterans, shall be exempt from taxation—

And so forth. But it has got to the point where it does not make much difference what laws the Congress passes, there are some attorneys in the District of Columbia who want to construe them out of the statute books. That is what they have done here. This amendment is merely to clarify the law, so that these lawyers cannot misunderstand it. It simply clarifies the law and makes it specific that this law means what it says, and that it is not repealed by implication, as they contend.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. There was a feeling among members of the committee that we had not anticipated that the corporation counsel would rule that these pensions and compensations were taxable.

Mr. RANKIN. This corporation counsel ruled that this law had been repealed by implication by a tax law that really does not touch it. But yet we have to come here and legislate in order to clarify it, in order to keep them from forcing some veteran to go to the Supreme Court and probably wait 2 or 3 years before his case is adjudicated.

Therefore I have offered this amendment in good faith, and I hope the gentleman will accept it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. There is no difference of opinion in the committee that there should be an exemption. We have felt that we were proceeding properly, but I will say that we agreed with the gentleman from Mississippi, and I accept his amendment.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

On last Friday we had a great deal of discussion in the House about the so-called quota system applying to Federal employees in the District of Columbia, which is the apportionment system. In order to take advantage of that law an employee must maintain a legal residence in the State from which he comes. I understand the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia has ruled that notwithstanding legal residence back in a State, and the actual payment of income tax in that State, these employees will likewise have to pay a third income tax in the District of Columbia. I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] whether he is favor of that system, or whether he is willing to help straighten it out so that it will not be triple taxation?

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman from Georgia well knows my feeling in that connection. I will say that I never voted for the conference report, and as chairman of the House conferees I refused to sign the conference report that brought this income-tax law here. Perhaps the gentleman will remember that I almost made myself hoarse trying to stop the House of Representatives from agreeing to the conference report for the very reason that the gentleman now states. Of course, as chairman of that subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia, we now have before us amendments to this bill which we are considering, and if it is possible for the gentleman from Oklahoma to write an amendment which will clarify the situation which the gentleman mentions, so that if an employee in the District of Columbia pays income tax to his State he will then not have to pay a tax to the District of Columbia, that amendment will be written, and I then hope that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK] will be backing the gentleman from Oklahoma in his effort to have it passed, as we failed to do in the last session. I do not mean to say the gentleman failed to support me, but we failed to pass the law.

Mr. RAMSPECK. May I ask the gentleman from West Virginia how he feels about that subject, as chairman of the committee?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I feel as does the distinguished gentleman from Georgia. I believe that is the general feeling in the committee. I am sure there will be a definite attempt to bring in some such legislation as he discusses.

I might say further in this connection that the corporation counsel also ruled that the payment of an income tax in the District of Columbia would not preclude that individual from voting in the State from whence he comes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Of course, he could not keep him from voting back in the State, but he is certainly trying to make him pay a tax that he ought not to pay. If he has to pay in the States, he ought not to pay in the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I wonder if that corporation counsel has gone into the reciprocal-trade agreements and passed on them yet? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAMSPECK. I do not know, I am sure.

I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MILLER. I have asked the gentleman to yield in order that I may ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] if his amendment is drawn carefully enough so that it will take in payments to widows and orphans?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; it applies to widows and orphans.

Mr. MILLER. No lawyer can say that you did not mean orphans?

Mr. RANKIN. The amendment is specific.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 7926) to amend the District Unemployment Compensation Act be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, this concludes the District of Columbia business on the calendar today.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, at the conclusion of the other special orders today, to address the House for 15 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I understand it is satisfactory for the gentleman from Florida to address the House at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from Florida will be recognized for 15 minutes.

There was no objection.

VETERANS' LEGISLATION

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, I urge your cooperation for immediate passage of legislation which will give straight service pension to all disabled war veterans. I would particularly call your attention to the provisions of H. R. 5074, which I introduced on March 15, 1939, as follows:

A bill to reenact the law providing for disability allowances for World War veterans and to restore former service-connected disability status

Be it enacted, etc., That the second and third paragraphs of section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 38, sec. 471), is hereby reenacted to read as follows:

"On and after the date of the reenactment of this paragraph any honorably discharged ex-service man who entered the service prior to November 11, 1918, and served 90 days or more during the World War, and who is or may hereafter be suffering from 10 percent or more permanent disability, as defined by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, not the result of his own willful misconduct, which was not acquired in the service during the World War, or for which compensation is not payable, shall be entitled to receive a disability allowance at the following rates: 10 percent permanent disability, $12 per month; 25 percent permanent disability, $20 per month; 50 percent permanent disability, $30 per month; 75 percent permanent disability, $40 per month; total permanent disability, $60 per month. No disability allowance payable under this paragraph shall commence prior to the date of the reenactment of this paragraph or the date of application therefor, and such application shall be in such form as the Administrator may prescribe: Provided, That no disability allowance under this paragraph shall be payable to any person not entitled to exemption from the payment of a Federal income tax for the year preceding the filing of application for such disability allowance under this paragraph. In any case in which the amount of compensation hereafter payable to any person for permanent disability under Public Law No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, is less than the maximum amount of the disability allowance payable for a corresponding degree of disability under the provisions of this paragraph, then such person may receive such disability allowance in lieu of compensation. Nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to allow the payment to any person of both a disability allowance and compensation during the same period; and all payments made to any person for a period covered by a new or increased award of disability allowance or compensation shall be deducted from the amount payable under such new or increased award. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed, upon the request of the Administrator, to transmit to the Administrator a certificate stating whether a veteran who is applying for a disability allowance under this paragraph was entitled to exemption from the payment of a Federal income tax for the year preceding the filing of application for the disability allowance and such certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the facts stated therein: Provided further, That any World War veteran who has drawn service-connected disability compensation for any period of 12 months since his or her discharge and who is not now drawing compensation shall be automatically restored to his or her former maximum compensation status: And provided further, That existing service-connected disability compensation rates of World War veterans and their widows and orphans shall be automatically increased 10 percent."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect on the 1st day of the first calendar month following the month during which this act is enacted.

This bill was referred to the House Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation and by the chairman of that committee referred to the Veterans' Administration for report. The Administration made a lengthy report on the bill, which was adverse. Among reasons for adverse report was the large expenditure which would be required by the Federal Treasury. I will not take your time to go into details of this report because I do not deem it necessary. I shall be glad to give to any of you desiring it a copy of the report. I have urged the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation to report the bill out for a vote by the House. The committee has not done this; therefore I have introduced House Resolution 343 for a rule from the Rules Committee for the bill, but the Rules Committee has not granted the rule. I have finally been forced to place on the Speaker's desk petition No. 22, which, if signed by 217 Congressmen with me, will force a vote on this legislation. I urge every one of you to call at the Speaker's desk and sign petition No. 22 in order that we may get a vote on this bill.

There are other bills introduced on the same subject, among these bills being H. R. 7925, introduced by Chairman RANKIN, and H. R. 7980, introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK]. These bills have been introduced subsequent to my bill but have, in the main, similar provisions. If you will sign the petition to force a vote on H. R. 5074, it will be taken up, and then during consideration on the floor amendments can be offered and the House will have an opportunity to consider provisions of all of the bills introduced on this subject. H. R. 5074 may not be a perfect bill, but it is a working basis for us to discuss, helpfully amend if advisable, and then to pass.

Relative to amendments, the House itself can decide upon same when the subject is before it, and I assure you of my agreement to any helpful amendments for the interest of all disabled ex-service men. It is my plan to offer an amendment to the bill to include the widows and orphans of disabled veterans, regardless to service connection of the death or ailment of the deceased veteran. I have a bill introduced on this subject and shall be glad to confer with my colleagues who are interested in this cause and work out with them suitable amendment to take care of the widows and orphans.

What I want is action and action now. I have no sympathy with the economy argument in connection with legislation for disabled war veterans and their dependents. Our Nation is the richest one on earth and is adequately able financially to provide for this cause. In fact, the financial condition of our country is far better than it was in 1932 and 1933 when Government financial retrenchment adversely affected the veterans of our Nation. In 1932 the total national income was a little less than $40,000,000,000, while now it is going healthily along at about $70,000,000,000 per year. This is an increase of more than 70 percent. I have every reason to believe that with continued business improvement the national income will soon reach the $80,000,000,000 annual mark.

Some of my colleagues urge that the Budget must be balanced. I for one shall never vote to balance the Budget at the expense of the war veterans and their dependents. I would like to see the Budget balanced, and we are soon going to see it balanced, but there is plenty of room among the huge appropriations which we are making, even though they are being reduced, to provide for reasonable security for our war heroes and their dependents. I am convinced concerning the justice of this and shall leave no stones unturned until this is accomplished. It is now time to give straight service pensions to all disabled World War veterans and also their widows and orphans, regardless to service connection of their disabilities. The history of soldiers' pension legislation in our country fully justifies action now for World War veterans.

PENSIONS FOR OTHER VETERANS

After the War between the States the Union soldiers and their widows received pensions from $6 to $12 per month by the act of June 27, 1890. This was about 25 years after the close of the war. Conditions then were far different to conditions now, and even though they waited 25 years after this war before receiving a pension, that time does not compare to 15 years in need and necessity in the present day. Some States of the Confederacy, I believe, gave State pensions to southern soldiers in less than 25 years.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR VETERANS

The Spanish-American War, as such, closed in 1899, but the Philippine Insurrection did not end until 1902. Soldiers of this cause were rightfully given pensions from $12 to $30 per month by the act of June 5, 1920. This was 21 years after the close of the Spanish-American War and 18 years after the Philippine Insurrection. The widows of this war received pensions in 1918, which was only 16 years after the Philippine Insurection ended.

The pensions which I have just referred to were, of course, for non-service-connected disabilities; in other words, they were straight service pensions.

The granting of these pensions to disabled veterans and their dependents will lessen the requirement for W. P. A. and other Federal expenditures. It is far more equitable to give veterans their just pensions than to force them on relief rolls or permit industry to exact from them labor which they are not physically able to perform. Many of the critics of pension legislation for veterans are forgetful of the sacrifices made by the veterans for their country. They served their country in time of its peril and were allowed about $1 to $1.25 per day. The Congress later allowed adjusted-service certificate or bonus for about an equal amount. During this same war period persons working in the shipyards and in industry as unskilled laborers were drawing from $5 to $15 per day. In addition to receiving small Army pay, the veterans faced all hazards of weather, disease, and the death-dealing weapons of the enemy. I cannot conceive of any fair-thinking citizen or representative Member of Congress who would now deny these disabled ones—and practically all of them are disabled—from drawing reasonable pensions from public funds.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

The hundreds of thousands of disabled veterans of our Nation cause us to think more of the eminent necessity of more adequate national defense. Thousands of veterans who are now disabled owe part of their disability to lack of preparedness on the part of our Government. The history of our Nation indicates that at all times we could have been more adequately prepared for our national defense. During these tragic times of world conflict it is imperative that our Nation should be more adequately prepared for its own defense. Some 75 percent of the world's population is actually or technically at war. Dark clouds are hovering closely over the entire world. The major powers of Europe are hourly exploding their deadly implements of war and ruthlessly slaughtering men, women, and children. Probably 40,000,000 persons in Europe are now bearing arms or are in feverish preparation for same. The air is filled with airplanes and the waters are charged with mines and infested with submarines. Battleships are anxiously patrolling the oceans for national existence of conflicting powers. Arms and ammunition factories are turning out known and unknown implements of war every hour in the day and night. Rights of minorities, creeds, and races are annihilated; in fact, nothing is able to halt the frantic onslaught of war destruction. In Asia the more than 500,000,000 members of the yellow race are in tragic conflict and slaughter for yellow imperialism.

With the modern methods of warfare and the great perfection of war machines, distances and oceans are no longer barriers to attack and conflict. In the past the Western Hemisphere has considered as its natural defense the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. This theory now is blasted. European nations own islands in the Caribbean Sea which is just off the Florida coast. Likewise European nations claim possessions in South America and to the north and east of the United States. Alaska, our territory of the northwest, is only a few minutes' flight from Japan. From many of these points bombers can in from a few minutes to a few hours sprinkle missiles of death on persons in any part of the United States. We are not secure in the sense that we once were. The Monroe Doctrine may in fact in the future have to be defended on soil of the Western Hemisphere. Never in the history of our Nation was preparedness and adequate national defense more imperative.

National Commander Raymond J. Kelly of the American Legion recently gave the present national-defense program of the American Legion, as follows: (1) America strong enough to meet invader before arrival; (2) supplies for 1,000,000 men for 1 year; (3) Panama Canal and approaches be made impregnable; (4) Regular Army, 280,000; National Guard, 426,000; (5) more division and corps field training in Regular Army; (6) more and better training for National Guard and Officers' Reserve; (7) development and increase, R. O. T. C. and C. M. T. C.; (8) National Guard for Hawaiian Territory; (9) a navy second to none; (10) additional Navy bases—we fortunately secured one of these for Jacksonville, Fla; (11) rehabilitate privately owned shipyards; (12) an adequate Naval and Marine Corps Reserve; (13) establish citizens' naval training corps; (14) more naval R. O. T. C. units; (15) new naval training ships; (16) new naval housing at all stations, and increased facilities at the Naval Academy; (17) fund be provided for completion of present aviation program; (18) more strategic flying fields; (19) further effort to develop rigid airships; (20) no exportation of helium—I voted against the exportation of helium for any purpose; (21) enlargement of airmail facilities to increase usable airports; (22) endorse Maritime Commission for merchant-marine training; (23) merchant marine officers and men to be members of United States Merchant Marine Naval Reserve; (24) Congress to establish a national maritime mediation board.

Commander Kelly closed his address with the following:

May noise never excite us to battle, or confusion reduce us to defeat.

I stand for this American Legion program.

FOREIGN "ISMS"

The various "isms" are largely responsible for the present unrest in the world today, and for the existing wars. Communism, nazi-ism, fascism, and atheism are having their sway in the shaping of the destinies of men. From the taint of these "isms" our Nation is not free. In the Congress we are doing all possible to control and eradicate foreign "isms" in America. The Dies investigating committee has helped a great deal toward routing these "isms" and informing the American public as to their dangers. In the Dies committee report recently submitted to Congress, the committee said:

Hundreds of pages of testimony have established the fact that the Communist Party of the United States can make no more than a superficial claim that it is a political party in the sense in which the American people understand those words. It is, on the contrary, a constituent member of the Communist International, and is its agent in the United States. The Communist International in turn is completely dominated by the Communist Party of Soviet Russia. The committee is forced to conclude that in practice the Communist Party is actually functioning as a border patrol on American shores for a foreign power—the Soviet Union.

I voted and spoke for continuance of the efforts of this committee.

On February 10, while addressing the National Youth Congress of America at the White House in Washington, President Roosevelt said:

You have no American right, by act or deed of any kind, to subvert the Government and the Constitution of this Nation.

I hoped that Russia would work out its own problems and that their government would eventually become a peace-loving popular government which would not interfere with the integrity of its neighbors. That hope is today either shattered or put away in storage against a better day. The Soviet Union, as a matter of practiced fact, * * * is a dictatorship as absolute as any other dictatorship in the world. It has allied itself with another dictatorship and it has invaded a neighbor so infinitesimally small that it could do no injury to the Soviet Union.

From the very development of things about us, we see that the foreign "isms" are trying to entrench their vicious doctrine within the United States and overthrow our form of government. I favor further legislative restrictions on the activities of these various "isms." I favor imprisonment of the perpetrators of un-American activities. I favor the deportation of all aliens who are engaged in these un-American activities, and, as a safeguard, I am opposed to admission of any more foreigners to our country until those here who are entitled to naturalization have been naturalized and those not entitled to naturalization have been deported. There is no room in our great democracy of the United States for any "ism" except Americanism, and all others must be outlawed and annihilated if we are to be secure from within.

KEEP OUT OF WAR

The nations of Europe now owe the United States about $12,000,000,000 as a result of the last World War. The European nations, as such, are friendly to us only when it serves their selfish and greedy ends. As a nation we are practically without friends in the world because America is powerful and rich and is dreaded and coveted by foreign countries. These debts could have been paid, in part at least, but instead the debtors arm for the next war. The World War cost us more than $40,000,000,000 besides the loss of life, the heartaches, and the tragedies. I earnestly hope that we will not become involved in the present world conflict. I can now see no reason for such and shall do all within my power to keep our Nation out of this war. The best method to keep us out of this war, as I see it, is to adequately prepare to defend our country and to rid our Nation of foreign "isms." [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I did not hear what committee the gentleman referred to.

Mr. GREEN. World War Veterans' Legislation.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman means this legislation is before the World War Veterans' Committee?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. GREEN. H. R. 5074, which would reenact the disability allowance and allow a straight service pension to disabled World War veterans who have as much as 10-percent disability on up to total disability. It would allow them pensions of from $12 to $60 per month. It also would give 10-percent increase for existing service-connected compensation.

Mr. RANKIN. The idea is that the gentleman is asking the Members to sign a petition to bring that bill out of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation?

Mr. GREEN. That is right.

Mr. RANKIN. Why does not the gentleman from Florida come before the committee?

Mr. GREEN. I have appeared before the committee and urged the reporting out of this bill. I did this at the last session, but the bill was not reported.

Mr. RANKIN. We are holding hearings now on disability allowance and compensation for veterans whose disabilities are not service connected.

Mr. GREEN. I understood that the gentleman's committee was now holding hearings on this matter and I desire to appear before the committee.

Mr. RANKIN. I may say to the gentleman from Florida that when we bring legislation to the floor, as a rule, we bring it in under the general rules of the House, and I suppose it will come up on a Calendar Wednesday. I suppose the bill when brought up will be subject to amendment. I see no reason whatever for anyone to try the petition route when we are holding hearings for this very purpose.

If the gentleman wants to come before the committee, we will try to give him time, and he may extend his remarks in the RECORD. But it is a little beside the question to rush in here and attempt to petition legislation out of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation, liberal as this committee has been to respond to the will of Congress and to the wishes of the veterans' organizations.

Mr. GREEN. The gentleman from Mississippi will recall that I appeared before the committee last session on this bill. The bill was introduced in the Seventy-fifth Congress also. I appeared then. On March 5, 1939, I reintroduced the bill and added one or two other provisions to it. It seems to me, therefore, that surely a year has given the committee pretty nearly time enough to consider it; but I am encouraged by the gentleman's statement. I shall appear before the committee.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not want to excite the gentleman, but I doubt if he gets enough signatures to bring it out on the floor this session, because the veterans of the House who are extremely interested in veterans' legislation know the committee.

Mr. GREEN. I shall appear before the committee; but the chairman cannot blame a Member who is anxious to give these veterans pensions, a Member who has had this bill pending now for 3 or 4 years, he cannot blame him for resorting to the petition method. I do not approve of the petition method, and resorted to it only as an emergency to try to do something at this session of Congress to get these pensions for veterans who do not have service-connected disabilities.

Mr. RANKIN rose.

Mr. GREEN. I do not yield further right now.

I am glad the gentleman's committee is working on this, and I am encouraged to know that the chairman himself has a bill for this purpose—a good one on this subject. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] also has a similar bill, and there are others pending before that committee which have good provisions. They were, I believe, introduced subsequent to March 15, 1939, and embrace in the main the substance of some of the provisions of the bill I am now discussing. I have no choice whatever as to which bill is passed, provided such bill gives a reasonable service pension to all disabled World War veterans. I am encouraged by the statement of the chairman of this committee. I am wondering if the gentleman can give us real assurance that legislation along this line will be brought out by the committee.

Mr. RANKIN. I may say to the gentleman from Florida that if any veterans' organizations want this bill brought out in this way, they have kept mighty quiet, because they have never said a word to any member of the Veterans' Committee or any veteran in the House so far as I know. For me to assure the gentleman from Florida, who has peremptorily filed a petition to bring out legislation that he knows is being considered by the Veterans' Committee, would not only be out of order but it would be presumptuous on the part of the chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. We will do the best we can. I want the House to know that the committee has not been derelict and is not derelict now.

Mr. GREEN. I do not censure the committee. I am trying to be helpful for this legislation now.

Mr. RANKIN. There are 21 members of the committee. If the gentleman had been half as diligent in inquiring of these members of the committee and of the veterans' organizations as he has been in placing this petition on the desk, he might have known something of the temper of the members of the committee. I can express myself, as chairman of the committee and as a Member of the House, that we are going to do the very best we can, just as we have been doing for disabled veterans and their widows and orphans, just as we were doing even before the gentleman from Florida came to Congress, but I am not going to tell him what the committee is going to do because I do not know.

Mr. GREEN. I appreciate that. My interpretation is that the committee has been slow to bring out this legislation, and that is why I have resorted to the petition method. I am earnest and sincere in getting, during the present session, pensions for these disabled World War veterans and the widows of those who died and who do not now get a pension.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CROWTHER. Did we not have a law on the statute books providing for non-service-connection disability with a pension?

Mr. GREEN. Yes; we have for total disability.

Mr. CROWTHER. Not total disability. Was it not in percentages of 25, 50, or 75?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. What became of that law?

Mr. GREEN. We now have law for total disability.

Mr. CROWTHER. Repealed during the economy drive, was it not?

Mr. GREEN. I have referred to that as being one of the most colossal blunders of all in the legislative history of the United States.

I am glad the War Veterans' Committee is working on this subject. I know that the chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi, has worked zealously on this matter and he has secured from the committee and from the Congress all that he possibly could. He is interested in the veterans' welfare.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN]?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Florida to certain facts. He talks about the World War Veterans' Committee being slow. I find that he filed this petition on the 22d of July, and to date there are only nine Members' signatures on it. Three times that number of Members have died in that time. The gentleman ought to go out on the roadside and watch the terrapins whiz by if he thinks he is fast compared with the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, there is a new petition, No. 22, now on the Clerk's desk. It was placed there after rule was requested for H. R. 5074.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I believe the gentleman from Florida has some justification for the viewpoint he is expressing. As a member of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation I, for one, will be pleased to sign the gentleman's petition immediately. I wish the gentleman well in his movement. I believe it is something we should have done a long time ago.

Mr. GREEN. Obviously so.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The World War veterans bared their breasts to the guns, steel, and gas of the enemy in order to preserve the heritage of this Nation, and it seems to me nothing we can do is too good for such patriots to repay them for that sort of service. I believe the gentleman is justified in promoting his idea and I hope he will push it fully.

Mr. GREEN. I thank the gentleman for his cooperation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein copy of H. R. 5074.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a short statement by Roger W. Babson appearing in the Washington Post of today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous special order, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BRYSON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

IMPORTS OF JAPANESE COTTON GOODS

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, permit forces, be they internal or external, to break down this Nation's established standard of living, and the lamp of democracy will suddenly grow dim in America. History, both ancient and modern, records how great democratic nations have been swept off the stage, and tragically so, as the economic essentials of democracy in those nations were either ignored or unwittingly lost.

In the more recent years of our own age we have witnessed nations of the east and west in a steady drift from democracy to dictatorship—a drift which occurs not because the men and women of those nations want it that way but because economic conditions in those nations make it that way. Lately we have come to more fully understand what it means—in terms of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—for this Nation to have a high standard of living. We realize now, as never before, perhaps, how important it is for us to maintain our established standard of living if we are to preserve the American way of life which we inherited.

The Members of this House will agree with me, I am sure, when I say that no time should be lost nor effort spared in hurling back any assault on our American standard of living. I rise this morning, therefore, to take a firm stand against a foreign attack on the living standards of American textile workers which is now in progress. The current flooding of this country with Japanese cotton goods of a particular type brings to the American textile industry not only fears for the future but also problems for the present.

Although importation of Japanese cotton goods in terms of square yards was 1,500 percent greater in 1939 than in 1932, it has been claimed that Japanese imports of recent years have represented less than 1 percent of our domestic production. Hence, it is easy and tempting, even if dangerous, to draw the conclusion that since Japanese imports represent less than 1 percent of our domestic production, no problem really exists. Thus, considered in such a restricted light, the problem of increased Japanese imports appears to be one of little consequence, but go beneath the surface of this analysis and facts will be found which we can hardly afford to minimize or disregard.

First, we must not overlook the fact that Japanese competition has been concentrated on cotton goods of certain constructions rather than spread out over the entire construction range of textile fabrics. In the case of one particular construction of cotton cloth—38½-inch, 60 by 48, 6.25—the concentrated volume of Japanese imports is already proving disastrous. For instance, one of our southeastern textile mills, which was running 1,400 looms, three shifts, on this 38½-inch, 60 by 48, 6.25 construction cloth during the summer and early fall, is not running a single loom today on this number because the rising tide of Japanese imports has demoralized the market for such cotton goods.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read certain portions of several letters which refer directly to this problem of increased importation of Japanese cotton goods:

[Letter from Pacific Mills, Lyman, S. C., January 29, 1940]

In connection with your fight on the Japanese import question and request for suggestions, I would like to point out that the Lyman division of the Pacific Mills was originally built to weave and finish wide bed sheetings and finish bleached goods woven at our Columbia division. Owing to the inroads made by the Japanese, it was necessary for us some time ago to diversify by equipping to handle dyed and printed cottons.

Lyman has grown with the help of these new facilities, but we are still terribly handicapped by having a large capacity for finishing bleached goods and unable to compete with the Japanese. I understand that Japanese imports of bleached goods for the first 11 months of 1939 were 64,920,000, which represented 95 percent of the total of Japanese piece-goods imports.

As the print-goods branch of the bleached-goods industry, which is chiefly affected, produces a yardage of about 160,000,000, it is obvious from this that the effect of Japanese imports has been very serious on this branch of the industry. By concentrating their imports in the bleached-goods classification, the Japanese are doing a great deal of harm to this branch of the industry.

We, at Lyman in particular, hope that something can be done to reduce Japanese imports of cotton cloth, or, in any event, to restrict the concentration on bleached goods.

(Signed) C. B. HAYES,
General Superintendent.

[Letter from Southern Handkerchief Manufacturing Co., Greenville, S. C., February 7, 1940]

We have noted with approval the firm stand you have taken on imports of Japanese cloth, which have so seriously jeopardized the textile industry in this country. We have been fighting this proposition for 4 years. To the best of our knowledge, there are only two handkerchief manufacturers in this country who have not used Japanese cloth, of which we are one.

We have just received full information on the imports of bleached goods from Japan for 1939, which are given on good authority as totaling 77,679,625 yards, as against 28,812,800 yards for 1938. These bleached goods comprise primarily qualities which are in direct competition with our great print-cloth industry in South Carolina.

It is logical to believe that these Japanese cloths will sooner or later do exactly what they did in 1937, when they broke the backbone of the print-cloth market and caused the most severe curtailment and loss to cotton mills and allied industries for a long time.

While 100,000,000 yards * * * is a small percentage of the total production of cotton cloths by American mills, when almost all of these imports are of a type which compete directly with print cloths, the competition is devastating.

We are with you in this fight and we stand ready to cooperate in every constructive effort to correct this competition, which is so seriously undermining our cotton mills and their employees.

(Signed) W. R. THOMSON,
President.

[Letter from Textile Fabrics Association to United States Tariff Commission, New York City, January 18, 1940]

This association is truly representative of the cotton-converting industry, and our members are large producers and converters of finished cotton piece goods. Our membership is deeply concerned with the influx of Japanese goods brought in and offered for sale in this country at prices which are radically below those of American producers.

Due to this unfair competitive situation which now exists in the domestic market, particularly for cotton bleached goods, because of the large quantities of similar Japanese goods now being imported into this country, we respectfully urge your honorable body to authorize and proceed with an investigation of American and Japanese costs of production of these goods.

(Signed) W. P. PICKETT,
President.

[Letter from the American Cotton Manufacturers Association to U. S. Tariff Commission, Durham, N. C., January 17, 1940]

The cotton textile industry in this country is gravely concerned, looking to the future, about Japanese competition. This danger has been great because of the very low cost of production in Japan and the rapid growth of the Japanese industry.

The present imports from Japan are very largely one description of print cloths, and this influx of great quantities of goods is having quite a bad effect on the status of the mills making this material, and on the market for same.

* * * Unless in some way the inroads into the textile business of this country from Japan are halted the mills will certainly be most adversely affected and lead to a great deal of curtailment and also loss of employment.

The mills are not only worried about print cloths but about the importation of all Japanese goods, which promises to show a steady and damaging increase.

(Signed) K. P. LEWIS,
President.

[Letter from the Print Cloth Group of Cotton Manufacturers to U. S. Tariff Commission, Clinton, S. C., January 23, 1940]

As director of the Print Cloth Group of Cotton Manufacturers, and as executive vice president of the Cotton Manufacturers Association of South Carolina, I wish to urge upon you the necessity of an immediate study of the critical situation resulting from the steady increase in imports of cotton textiles from Japan.

These imports, according to your records, have steadily increased and are unfortunately concentrated on one construction—38½ inch, 60 by 48, 6.25—very largely. This has brought about a demoralized state which is injurious to the entire print-cloth market.

* * * the average wage in a Japanese mill is 24½ cents a day for a 10-hour day, which brings it down to 2½ cents an hour. The girls, on the other hand, are fed and kept in dormitories, but this costs very little as they are fed on rice and dried fish On the comparison of our wages with this, we need much more protection than we have and there is no doubt if the Japanese were not timid for good reasons, they could ship into this country enormous quantities of many different varieties of cotton goods.

Another point to be taken into consideration is the fact that the yen has so depreciated in value that the Japs have a great advantage today. The par value of the yen was 84 cents. The value a year ago was 27 cents and the value today is 23½ cents. Of course this depreciation gives them a great advantage in costs which is reflected in ad valorem rates.

The tariff on bleached cotton piece goods made of print-cloth yarns is 13 percent ad valorem and, in addition thereto, for each number, thirty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent ad valorem.

The duty on rayons is 45 cents per pound plus 45 percent ad valorem. This brings the duty on low spun rayon fabrics over 100 percent. It does seem unfair that rayon goods have so much more protection than cotton goods.

(Signed) WM. P. JACOBS, Director.

It has been my purpose in reading these letters to furnish you with first-hand information on the gravity of the situation developing in the American textile industry as a result of unchecked increases in Japanese imports. If such imports were spreading evenly over all types of cotton goods the effect of this intensified Japanese competition would probably not be so serious; but, as already pointed out, when almost all of these imports are of a type which compete directly with print cloths, the competition is devastating.

The situation is made still more acute by reason of the fact that nearly all print cloths are manufactured in several Southeastern States. This is particularly true in the case of South Carolina, where it is estimated that fully 85 percent of our domestic print cloths are manufactured. If some foreign nation were to suddenly flood this country with a popular-priced automobile, the automobile industry in Michigan would have to absorb the brunt of that competition just as the textile industry in South Carolina is having to absorb the brunt of present Japanese competition in our domestic cotton-goods market.

Let us consider for a moment what measures might be adopted to meet this situation. Our choice in this matter lies between two alternatives of action. We may, on the one hand, equalize Japanese and American costs of production by basing the duty on Japanese imports upon American instead of Japanese costs; or, on the other hand, we may equalize Japanese and American costs of production by reducing wages and lengthening hours of work; or, to put it quite bluntly, lower the present standard of living for our American textile workers.

Having in mind the adoption of the first of the above-mentioned alternatives, I prepared several weeks ago a petition which was filed with the United States Tariff Commission on January 31. The petition reads as follows:

To Hon. RAYMOND B. STEVENS,
Chairman, United States Tariff Commission:

I

Section 336, part (a), of the Tariff Act is cited as authority for the submission of this application.

II

By this application the Tariff Commission is respectfully requested to undertake, at the earliest practicable date, a careful and comprehensive investigation of differences in American and Japanese costs of production of cotton cloth.

III

For the purpose of bringing about the proper equalization of Japanese and American costs of production (as contemplated under sec. 336 of the act), the Commission is urged to proceed in this investigation with a view to determining the necessity of either: (1) Basing the duty on Japanese imports upon American instead of Japanese costs, or (2) placing an excise duty on Japanese imports.

IV

An investigation looking to the adoption of one of the alternatives suggested in part III of this application is held advisable and necessary because:

1. Restrictions, as presently applied to Japanese cotton goods, fail to provide an adequate measure of protection for manufacturers and workers of the American textile industry, which is intended under the Tariff Act.

2. The unchecked, rapidly advancing, increase in Japanese imports is having a disastrous effect on the American textile industry.

3. For a number of other industries the problem of affording American manufacturers protection against the vicious competitive practices of foreign manufacturers and exporters; of affording American industrial workers protection against the demoralizing effects of cheap, low-wage, foreign labor; and of affording American consumers protection against the deceptiveness of inferior quality goods of foreign manufacture has been successfully met by the adoption of methods recommended in part III of this application.

INABILITY OF PRESENT RESTRICTIONS TO AFFORD AMPLE PROTECTION

In April 1936 the Tariff Commission reported to the President that existing duties fixed by statute did not equalize the differences in cost of production of cotton cloth made in this country and the same or similar goods produced in Japan. Acting on this information the President ordered certain increases in the rates of duty under paragraph 904 (b) of the Tariff Act for the purpose of equalizing production costs between the two countries.

Failure of this action to accomplish its purpose has been demonstrated by the marked increase in Japanese imports during the past several years. In this connection special attention is called to the analysis of Japanese imports furnished by the Association of Cotton Textile Merchants of New York in the supplement of this application. It is estimated that total imports for the calendar year of 1939 will probably approximate 75,000,000 square yards as contrasted with 29,000,000 square yards in 1938.

DISASTROUS EFFECT OF INCREASED JAPANESE IMPORTS ON AMERICAN TEXTILE INDUSTRY

The effect of increased Japanese imports on the American textile industry has been made more acute by reason of the fact that the foreign competition has been concentrated on cotton goods of certain constructions rather than spread out over the entire range of textile fabrics. Much of the cotton goods coming from Japan have been concentrated on one construction—38½ inches, 60 by 48, 6.25—which has been a strong factor in demoralizing the entire print-cloth market.

Furthermore the Japanese practice of concentrating on cotton goods of particular constructions has seriously affected the textile industry in certain areas of the country. Print cloth manufacturers which are suffering most from this condition are located for the most part in South and North Carolina and other Southeastern States.

MEETING THE PROBLEM BY BASING DUTY ON AMERICAN PRODUCTION COSTS

Already the duty on woolen gloves, cotton rugs, canvas shoes, and other articles is based upon American costs of production. Thus the industries producing these articles are being afforded protection which was impossible when the duty was based on declared foreign costs of production.

With respect to cotton goods the records clearly show that Japanese valuation for duty purposes has dropped to an average price of less than 3½ cents per square yard. It is understood that the Japanese Government allocates a certain proportion of the mills' production for export—probably in order to establish exchange—and the mills have to accept the return they can get for such exports. In accomplishing this the Japanese declare extremely low values on cotton goods, and there is no way of checking the valuations since such textiles are manufactured largely for export purposes.

V

The textile industry and textile workers are entitled to protection against this destructive Japanese competition. Ours is a high standard of living for the American worker which must be preserved.

The average wage in a Japanese mill is 24½ cents a day for a 10-hour day, which brings it down to 2½ cents an hour. Japanese workers are regimented as the girls are kept in dormitories and fed largely on rice and dried fish. We must protect both the American worker and manufacturer against this menace of low wages and regimentation.

VI

The Commission is respectfully urged to carefully study all letters supplementing this application. These letters are representative of the entire American textile industry and point to the great need for immediate action by the Tariff Commission along the lines recommended in this application.

Respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH R. BRYSON,
Member of Congress.

Attempts to equalize Japanese and American costs of production by basing tariff rates on Japanese costs have failed because the Japanese have utilized the device of lowering the declared value of imports. The Japanese have found that they can defeat the purpose of our tariff restrictions by simply declaring lower values, and prices in Japan cannot be checked because these goods are practically all sold for export. For example, the declared value of Japanese bleached cotton cloth dropped from 7.06 cents per square yard in 1932 to about 3.46 cents per square yard in 1939. By declaring this lower valuation on their cotton goods, the Japanese were able to ship into America over 1,500 percent more square yards of cotton cloth during 1939 than they shipped in during 1932.

It is obvious that we shall never be able to protect the American textile industry against this viciously destructive competition as long as we accept the values on cotton goods which the Japanese declare. The only effective way to deal with this problem is to base tariff duties on known American costs of production instead of claimed Japanese costs of production. It is with this objective in view that I urge every Member of this House to carefully consider the need for an investigation such as I have requested of the United States Tariff Commission. [Applause.]

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, A REPUBLIC, NOT A DEMOCRACY

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 4 minutes, and to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KERR). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to read an article by C. S. Longacre appearing in a magazine called Liberty, published in the city of Washington. The word "democracy" has been so misused during the last few years that I believe the article is particularly valuable at this time. It reads as follows:

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, A REPUBLIC, NOT A DEMOCRACY

(By C. S. Longacre)

A great deal has been said and written of late by men and women of renown and much learning about the dangers which face our American democracy. The University of Virginia, in making up its program for the Institute of Public Affairs, which it conducts each summer, lists the following topics to be discussed: Religion and our American democracy; Religion, the indispensable basis of democracy; Comparison of the individual in Germany and in the democracies; How can religion defend itself and save democracy? and Religion in a democracy.

But the University of Virginia is not alone in making a wrong use of the word "democracy" as applied to the American system and form of government. Many statesmen and modern writers have been equally guilty of making the wrong use of the word. When we entered the World War some 20 years ago we adopted the slogan, "Save the world for democracy." The writer himself confesses that inadvertently he has on several occasions fallen into the same error by force of habit and wrong example. This wrong habit is very contagious and is spreading rapidly.

When we studied American history in our youth we learned that it was improper to call our American Republic a democracy. Such terminology as "our democracy" or "our democratic form of government" was considered by our teachers and elders as being not only misleading but mischievous and dangerous as well.

TWO DIFFERENT FORMS OF GOVERNMENT

The founders of the American Republic and the framers of the Constitution of the United States were unanimous in their understanding of the difference between a republic and a democracy. There were some who advocated at the conclusion of the American Revolutionary War that a democracy should be established in America in which all the people might have a direct hand in the making of the laws and the administering of the Government. But James Madison, in the Federalist, under the title "Democracy, the Bait of Theoretic Politicians Who Err," denounced them as "schemers." He said:

"Democracies have ever been spectacles of turbulence and contention; have ever been found incompatible with personal security or the right of property, and have in general been as short in their lives as they have been violent in their deaths. Theoretic politicians who have patronized this species of government have erroneously supposed that by reducing mankind to a perfect equality in their political rights they would at the same time be perfectly equalized and assimilated in their professions, their opinions, and their passions. * * * A republic, by which I mean a government in which the scheme of representation takes place, opens a different prospect, and promises the cure for which we are seeking. * * * The true distinction between these forms is that in a democracy the people meet and exercise the government in person. In a republic they assemble and administer it by their representative agents. * * * The first question that offers itself is whether the general form and aspect of the government be strictly republican. It is evident that no other form would be reconcilable with the genius of the American people."

DEMOCRACY STUDIOUSLY AVOIDED

James Madison was secretary of the Constitutional Convention, and he was chairman of the committee which drafted the Constitution, and is said to have drafted it in its original form with his own pen. Article IV, section 4 of the Constitution provides: "The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government." The phrase "democratic form of government" was studiously avoided by the framers of the Constitution. Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, and other notable ones in that Convention joined Madison in his contention that a "republican form of government" should be adopted and guaranteed instead of a "democratic form of goverment."

During the Convention, Hamilton said: "The members most tenacious of republicanism were as loud as any in disclaiming against the vices of democracy. We are now to decide forever the fate of republican government."

After the Convention in 1803, Hamilton wrote to Pickering: "The plan of a constitution which I drew up while the Convention was sitting and which I communicated to Madison was predicated on these bases:

"1. That the political principles of the people of this country would endure nothing but republican government.

"2. That in the actual situation of the country it was in itself right and proper that the republican theory should have a full and fair trial.

"3. That to such a trial it was essential that the government should be so constructed as to give all energy and stability reconcilable with the principles of that theory."

Thomas Jefferson was one of the most ardent advocates of a republican form of government instead of a democratic. He became the leader of the young Republican Party as opposed to a democratic or an exclusive Federal Government.

In defending the republican form of government, he said:

"To preserve the republican form and principles of our Constitution and cleave to the salutary distribution of powers which that has established are the two sheet anchors of our Union. If driven from either, we shall be in danger of foundering. * * * A just and solid republican government maintained here will be a standing monument and example for the aim and imitation of the people of other countries. * * * The station which we occupy among the nations of the earth is honorable, but awful. Trusted with the destinies of this solitary Republic of the world, the only monument of human rights, and the sole depository of the sacred fire of freedom and self-government, whence it is to be lighted up in other regions of the earth, if other regions of the earth shall ever become susceptible of its benign influence. All mankind ought, then, with us, to rejoice in its prosperous, and sympathize in its adverse, fortunes, as involving everything dear to man."

George Washington in his farewell address to his countrymen warned against the dangers which threatened our country's "republican liberty" and "republican government." In his messages to Congress, he always calls the United States a "republic" and never a "democracy."

A pure democracy is a form of government "in which the supreme power is retained by the people" as "distinguished from aristocracy," says Webster. Webster further defines a "republic" as "a state in which the sovereign power resides in a certain body of the people, and is exercised by representatives elected by, and responsible to them."

FORM OF GOVERNMENT EARNESTLY DEBATED

The founding fathers who framed our form of government in the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia in 1787 earnestly debated which form of government they should establish—a republican or a democratic—a government in which the chosen representatives of the people enacted the laws, or in which the people themselves directly made and administered them. Some were in favor of a democracy and some in favor of a republic. Hamilton opposed the establishment of a democracy. He said: "Give all power to the many; they will oppress the few. Give all power to the few; they will oppress the many. Both, therefore, ought to have the power, that each may defend itself against the other."

In speaking of the irresistible passions and furies which control the multitudes in a democratic form of government, he chided those who were advocating the establishment of a democracy as "not duly considering the amazing violence and turbulence of the democratic spirit. When a great object of government is pursued, which seizes the popular passions, they spread like wildfire and become irresistible." It appeared that some of the delegates from the New England States argued that "no good executive could be established on republican principles." But Hamilton answered that it first was essential to have a good government in order to establish a good executive. Hamilton said he saw "the Union dissolving, or already dissolved" under the democratic principles of government as manifested under the Confederation which preceded our Union, and that he saw "evils operating in the States which must soon cure the people of their fondness for democracies."

The distinction between a "democracy" and a "republic" was clearly understood by the founders of the American Republic as well as by our forefathers who succeeded them in the administration of the Government. Even the "Democratic Party," which is merely a political name, clearly understood the distinction between a "democratic form of government" and a "republican form of government." In that party's platform of 1856 we find these expressions: Dangerous to our republican institutions"; and "every future American State that may be constituted or annexed with a republican form of government." In the platform of 1864: "Brave soldiers and sailors of the Republic." In the platform of 1876: "Do here record our steadfast confidence in the perpetuity of republican self-government"; and "now reunited in one indivisible Republic and a common destiny." In the platform of 1892: "Under the Constitution as framed by the fathers of the Republic"; and "believing that the preservation of republican government in the United States." In the platform of 1896: "The dual system of government established by the founders of this Republic of republics." In the platform of 1900: "We assert that no nation can long endure half republic and half empire"; "we are not willing to surrender our civilization nor to convert the Republic into an empire"; and "this Republic has no place for a vast military service and conscription." In the platform of 1904: "The structure of our free Republic." In the platform of 1908: "Believing with Jefferson in 'the support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against antirepublican tendencies.'"

Thomas Jefferson said: "To preserve the republican form, * * * a just and solid republican government maintained here will be a standing monument."

The Honorable James M. Beck, LL. D., in his book entitled, "Constitution of the United States," says: "The framers believed in representative government to which they gave the name 'republicanism' as the antitheses of 'democracy.'" Von Holst, in his work on Constitutional Law, says: "It [the Constitution] not only promises that the Union will interpose with all its might on their behalf if internal or external causes threaten to overthrow their republican form of government, but it absolutely forbids them to adopt any other form under any condition or for any reason whatsoever."

The Journal of the Proceedings of the Constitutional Convention, the book Federalist, and the constitutional authorities, as well as the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, declare that the United States Government is a "Republic," based on "republican principles," "republican ideals," "republican doctrine," having "republican institutions" and "a republican form of government." The label "democracy" as applied to America is an un-American malapropism.

THE MOB HELD IN LEASH

A purely democratic form of government is subject to the passions and emotions of the multitude and frequently resorts to mob rule. Communists boast of being democratic and of favoring a democracy instead of a republic. Under a purely democratic form of government there are no property rights and no class distinctions; all things are held in common. If the multitude decides to abolish churches and clergymen, or freedom of religion, of speech, of the press, and the natural, God-given rights of the individual for the benefit of the whole, it is done under a democratic rule of government. Under a republican form of government it cannot be done so easily, for the multitude is not in control, nor does it make and execute the laws. A republic is not ruled by men, but by law. The lawmakers and the administrators are subject to the fundamental law of the land and, as the supreme authority, can exercise only such powers as are consistent with the constitution. The passions of the multitude and the mob are held in leash by the constitution in a republic. In a pure democracy in critical times everything is controlled by the impulses and the immediate will of the people as a whole, while in a republic everything is subjected to the supreme authority of the constitution, and the people choose many peers as their representatives to speak and act in harmony with the will of the people as set forth in the constitution as the fundamental law of the land.

ALL RIGHTS GUARDED

Under the American Constitution the minority and the individual have certain natural and God-given rights which no legislative or judicial power can rightfully abridge or deny, but in a pure democracy the whim of the majority controls and may nullify and override every inalienable right of the minority. The creators of our Republic and the makers of our Constitution were convinced that a democracy would not succeed and that a republic was the only kind of government under which the powers of the mob could be limited and the rights of the minority protected operating under a written Constitution.

Not only the civil, but the religious, rights of the individual which are safeguarded under our Constitution are placed in jeopardy under the dominant and arbitrary rule of a pure democracy. A written constitution which cannot be amended without careful deliberation and a fitting lapse of time to prevent quick action inspired by hasty passion on the part of the multitude is the only security of civil and religious liberty, so far as the welfare of minorities is concerned.

A REAL DANGER

We are not dealing here with an imaginary contingency which is foreign to America, but with a real danger that is facing our free republican institutions and our constitutional guaranties of human rights in these United States of America. In recent years our drift has been away from a republic toward a democracy. Many of the civil rights guaranteed to the individual under our written Constitution have already been undermined and overridden by the delegation of legislative and judicial powers to the Chief Executive and his appointive bureaus. All history testifies to the unfailing truth that after the civil rights of minority groups have been undermined very little time lapses before the religious rights of minority groups are likewise destroyed. It is this tendency under the arbitrary rule of a pure democracy that concerns this magazine. For this reason we point out the danger couched in the wrong use of the phrase, "Our American democracy." The wrong use may lead to the wrong application of laws and principles. May God save our Republic from being changed into a pure democracy.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay my humble tribute to the memory of one of America's most illustrious sons.

Yesterday was the ninety-third anniversary of the birth of Thomas Alva Edison, our country's greatest contribution to the world's list of scientific men.

He was the foremost inventive genius of the age and one of the leading benefactors of mankind. He was the greatest liberator the world has ever known. By the force of his matchless genius, aided by his tireless energy, he struck the shackles of drudgery from untold millions of human beings and lifted the world into the light of a new civilization, the like of which humanity had scarcely dreamed.

He stands in history among the leaders of the men of genius of all time—Homer, Galileo, Michelangelo, Rembrandt, Mozart, Cervantes, Shakespeare, Columbus, Jefferson, Newton, and Marconi. Towering amid that great galaxy rises the immortal figure of Edison, in glorified silhouette against the horizon of the ages, sending a glow of radiance down the centuries to come, to stir the hopes and fire the imaginations of toilers of the future who struggle for the betterment of mankind.

It is unnecessary to attempt to magnify his virtues, to minimize his vices, or to clothe him with qualities he did not have. All that is necessary to commend him to the minds and hearts of peoples of all climes is the simple story of this earnest, patient man, toiling through the silent hours of the night to make the world a better place in which to live.

He was the greatest public servant of his day; yet he held no political office, he founded no political party, he advanced no new political creeds. Therefore no array of illustrious speakers volunteer to sing his praise or use his name as a sounding board to further selfish ends.

He was one of the mightiest conquerors this world has ever seen; yet he waged no wars of human destruction, he fought no bloody battles, he stirred no fires of human hate nor pandered to the baser passions of the race. But he conquered the elements, as it were, and gave to humanity the greatest ascendancy over the forces of nature the world has ever known. He brought the dawn of a new civilization—the electric age.

He never intentionally hurt a human being. Therefore no memorial has been erected to him in his country's Capital, no monument dedicated to his name, no blazing epitaph upon these historic walls proclaim his services to the world.

I sometimes wonder if we really appreciate the services of men of genius. They scale the heights and blaze the way to those sublime achievements that mark the milestones in the progress of the race, while men of talent dig in, solidify, and hold the gains and enjoy the progress that genius makes.

Have you ever thought what would happen if we should lose all that men and women of genius have accomplished for the world? What this land would be like? It would be a different world—cold, pulseless, monotonous, and silent. Our transportation system would come to a standstill, the telephone and telegraph wires would become useless obstructions, the lights would go out, the radio would be silenced, and all the machinery of industry, as well as that of commerce would cease to move. As has been well and wisely said, if you take from the world all that genius has given, "all the niches would be empty, all the walls would become naked, meaning and connection would fall from words of poetry and fiction, music would go back to common air, and all the forms of subtle and enchanting art would lose proportion, to become the unmeaning waste and shattered spoil of thoughtless chance."

It would be useless to attempt to enumerate all the things that Edison did for mankind. His greatest contribution was the invention of the electric light,—the incandescent lamp. With that one act he did more to change the course of our civilization than has any other man who ever "lived in the tide of time." He not only lighted our halls, our homes, our streets, and our highways, but he gave us the spark that fires the gas that makes the motor machine possible.

He ushered in the electric age, and the motor age as well. He made possible the automobile, the X-ray, the airplane, the submarine, the moving picture, and the radio. He gave us a new system of overland transportation, taught us to navigate the air, and enabled us to roam with safety on the bottom of the seas. He eliminated time and space and aided us to see through objects that were formerly supposed to exclude all light.

He made possible mass production through new industrial machinery, and gave us that great multiplicity of electrical appliances that add to the comforts and conveniences of every home and every business establishment. He made necessities luxuries, and luxuries necessities, and enabled us to electrify the farm homes of America and to lift from the shoulders of burdened humanity the great weight of drudgery under which farm men and women have struggled since the beginning of time.

He tapped a source of wealth richer than the diamond mines of Golconda, more valuable than all the oil fields and all the gold and diamond mines of the modern and ancient world—a wealth that is inexhaustible, and one that will last as long as rains fall and rivers flow to the sea.

There is enough hydrcelectric power in our navigable streams alone, that throughout uncounted centuries has been running waste and wanton to the sea, to electrify every home in America, including every farm home, and then have enough left to supply every commercial establishment, if not every industry throughout the land.

His monument is in every home that turns an electric switch; his epitaph is written on every heart that beats in gratitude for the services he gave. He needs no pompous memorial to commemorate his life. He needs no monument save the eternal and indestructible substance of his own greatness to commend him to the consideration of all coming ages. His name will live and his fame will reach to the remotest times in which civilized man shall dwell upon the earth.

Someone has said that—

They are the truly great who, as the centuries slowly pass, are found by each succeeding race near to the heart of human love.

Centuries may come and go, empires may flourish and pass away, republics may rise and fall, but the work of Edison will endure.

When the monuments to lesser men shall have perished with the lapse of time, when this Republic shall have run its course and taken its place among the dead nations of the past, when in the distant lapse of ages yet to come, errant wanderers from different lands shall stand before the crumbling columns of this Capitol and look down across the ruins of the District of Columbia, the name of Thomas A. Edison will remain, unscarred by the wreck of ages and undimmed by the floods of time. [Applause.]

SENATE

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1940

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 7, 1940)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O merciful God and Heavenly Father, whose love to us is long suffering and infinitely tender: Direct our minds beyond all vain imaginings, all barriers of fear to the abiding reality of Thy presence, where falsehood, sin, and cowardice disappear. It may be that we know not what we ask, but dare we ask for less? If we have sought to serve our country relying solely on ourselves, if we have tried to slake our thirst at broken cisterns or veil the naked flame that burns within, teach us in this moment of self-examination that if we seek to know the mysteries of life we must ask for fortitude to bear the truth. Direct us to the blessed Christ that, realizing His utter sacrifice, His broken heart, we may learn to walk His way, think His thoughts, and speak with His authority, striving by word and deed to shape the destiny of the Nation and all the nations of the world, according to Thy purpose, through Him who gave His life for all mankind. We ask it in His name and for His sake. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of New York, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service:

Whereas the problem of the unemployed middle-aged worker has been steadily increasing in severity during the past 10 years; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of New York, recognizing the severity of said problem, has created by resolution a joint legislative committee to study the problem and suggest methods of its solution; and

Whereas it was immediately recognized that government itself was one of the major offenders in the matter of discrimination against the middle-aged worker, and that the State of New York might profitably set an example to industry to follow; and

Whereas in 1938 the committee recommended and caused to be introduced and passed a bill restricting the State civil-service commission and the various municipal civil-service commissions within the State in this regard, prohibiting the placing of arbitrary age limits as eligibility requirements for certain civil-service positions; and

Whereas not only the committee but industry, labor, and those connected with the civil service have hailed the salutary effect of this legislative restriction and have pointed out the progressive record of New York State in this regard compared to the regulations of the Federal Civil Service Commission: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Congress of the United States be, and hereby is, respectfully memorialized to enact similar legislation without delay, to the end that discrimination against older persons in the Federal civil service be abolished, and that the work of public and private agencies in behalf of the middle-aged worker be enhanced by the good example set by the Federal Government; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, Secretary of United States Senate, Clerk of the House of Representatives, and to each member of the Senate and House Committees of the Civil Service, and that they be urged to use their best efforts to accomplish the purpose of this resolution.

NATIONAL INVENTORS' DAY

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to introduce a joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, on the joint resolution I should like to say that last Sunday, February 11, was the birthday anniversary of one of New Jersey's most distinguished, most useful, most outstanding citizens—one of America's great contributions to the world, Thomas A. Edison.

The inventive genius of this truly great man of yesterday contributes so much to the health, the happiness, the convenience, and the general welfare of mankind of today, that I think it only fitting and proper that the Congress of the Nation acknowledge the gratitude of humanity to this great American by adopting a joint resolution declaring his birthday, February 11, as National Inventors' Day.

Mr. President, I send such a resolution to the desk, with the request that it be read and referred to the proper committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be read and referred to the Committee on the Library.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 209) providing for the observance of National Inventors' Day, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Library, as follows:

Whereas February 11 is the birth date of Thomas A. Edison, the Nation's greatest inventive genius; and

Whereas the Nation owes a debt of gratitude to Mr. Edison and other inventors whose works have improved progress and civilization; and

Whereas the United States should encourage not only American inventive genius as expressed by the research scientists, inventors, and engineers of today, but of the future, as we march on the road to further accomplishments in science, industry, business, and commerce: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That February 11 of each year be designated and observed as National Inventors' Day.

REPORT OF ATTORNEY GENERAL'S COMMITTEE ON ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, there is pending before the Senate today a bill commonly called the Logan bill, Senate bill 915. The bill has to do with administrative procedure.

A committee of distinguished lawyers was appointed by the former Attorney General to study this matter of administrative procedure. The committee is composed of Dean Acheson, chairman; Ralph F. Fuchs, Lloyd K. Garrison, D. Lawrence Groner, Henry M. Hart, Jr., Carl McFarland, James W. Morris, Harry Shulman, E. Blythe Stason, and Arthur T. Vanderbilt. For over a year the committee has been making a study of the very intricate and difficult question of administrative procedure.

On January 31, 1940, the chairman of the committee wrote to the President of the United States a letter concerning the matter, in which he pointed out that the committee had been studying the subject for a year and will be ready to make its report along in May of this year, that the problem is a tremendously intricate one upon which a report cannot be stricken off at one fell swoop, and asking the consideration of the Attorney General for time for further study.

I ask unanimous consent that the letter of Mr. Acheson to the Attorney General of the United States may be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. I hope Senators may find it agreeable to read this very enlightening letter of Mr. Acheson.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I have no objection; but I desire to say that I have read the letter, and I am so satisfied with the letter that at as early a date as possible I shall move to have the Senate take up for consideration the bill to which the Senator refers.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Attorney General Jackson today made public the attached report of the Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure. As the report indicates, this committee has been in existence for approximately 1 year. The chairman is Dean Acheson, of Washington, D. C. The other members of the committee are Ralph F. Fuchs, Lloyd K. Garrison, D. Lawrence Groner, Henry M. Hart, Jr., Carl McFarland, James W. Morris, Harry Shulman, E. Blythe Stason, and Arthur T. Vanderbilt.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S COMMITTEE ON ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE,
DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1940.

The honorable the ATTORNEY GENERAL.

MY DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: On February 16, 1939, the President, acting upon the earlier suggestion of former Attorney General Cummings, requested then Attorney General Murphy to appoint a committee to investigate the "need for procedural reform in the field of administrative law." "A thorough and comprehensive study should be made of existing practices and procedures," wrote the President, "with a view to detecting any existing deficiencies and pointing the way to improvements." Accordingly, on February 24, 1939, Attorney General Murphy created this committee in order "to ascertain in a thorough and comprehensive manner" the extent to which criticisms of the administrative procedure of Federal agencies were well founded and "to suggest improvements if any are found advisable."

Since it is "the Attorney General's committee," it is eminently fitting that the committee report to you the present status of its work and ask your wishes as to its future.

When the committee met to organize and plan its program, it was faced with the fact that there was no authentic collection of information on the actual procedure and practices of the numerous Federal agencies. To undertake the initial task of assembling the facts, the committee employed as its director Mr. Walter Gellhorn, of the faculty of law of Columbia University, and a small but able staff of lawyer-investigators. The investigations of this staff into the facts of administrative procedure in the various agencies have been progressing at a constantly accelerated pace.

From the start it was clear to the committee that it could not in a short time and with a limited staff study in detail every agency of the Federal Government. It therefore decided to give its attention to those agencies which directly affect persons outside the Government, either by adjudication or by rule making; for these are the agencies which give rise to the greatest amount of litigation and discussion regarding "administrative law." This limitation excludes agencies engaged in the managerial work of the Government (e. g., Civil Service Commission, Bureau of the Budget), those engaged in "proprietary" activities (e. g., Tennessee Valley Authority), and those which are confined to lending and public-works programs (e. g., Reconstruction Finance Corporation, U. S. Housing Authority, Federal Works Agency), as well as those which are essentially of a service character (e. g., Bureau of Standards).

The committee decided that its staff should study each of the remaining agencies. Studies of 15 agencies have now been completed. They have involved extended interviews with officials and employees of the agencies involved, with members of the public affected, and with attorneys who have represented clients before these agencies. Members of the committee's staff have attended numerous hearings and other administrative proceedings as observers, and have closely examined the files of the agencies to discover the methods utilized in disposing of matters arising under the various statutes and regulations. Upon the completion of these investigations the staff has prepared for the study of the committee a preliminary report upon each agency, discussing in detail its administrative procedures. The report has been given to the officers of the affected agency for their consideration and comment. Thereafter, the full committee has met with the agency's officers to discuss with them the facts and problems disclosed by the report.

It is planned that this program will be followed with each of the remaining agencies.

When these individual studies are finished—which should be by the end of May 1940—the committee intends, in cooperation with various bar and other legal associations, to hold a series of public hearings on the administrative procedures of particular agencies and groups of agencies with full opportunity for expressions of opinion upon all procedural problems. The committee hopes that these hearings may be held during the month of June 1940, and that its final report may be made to you in the autumn of this year.

If the hearings are to be fruitful, there should be widespread understanding of the information already in the committee's possession. For that reason, the committee proposes, with your approval, to make available for public distribution copies of the studies which have been submitted to it by its staff, as revised by the staff in the light of the discussions already described. Eleven such monographs are submitted to you at this time, relating to the Division of Public Contracts, Department of Labor; Veterans' Administration; Federal Communications Commission; United States Maritime Commission; Federal Alcohol Administration; Federal Trade Commission; the administration of the Grain Standards Act, Department of Agriculture; Railroad Retirement Board; Federal Reserve System; Bureau of Marine Inspection and Navigation, Department of Commerce; the administration of the Packers and Stockyards Act, Department of Agriculture. In addition, the staff has recently completed studies of the Post Office Department, the National Labor Relations Board, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and the Comptroller of the Currency; reports relative to their procedures and practices will be submitted to you in the near future. Studies have been commenced, in some cases, and are being initiated in others, upon the following: War Department, National Mediation Board, National Railroad Adjustment Board, Tariff Commission, Department of Agriculture,[1] Bureau of Internal Revenue, Board of Tax Appeals, Bureau of Customs, Department of the Treasury, Civil Aeronautics Authority, Department of State, Federal Power Commission, Federal Home Loan Bank Board, Securities and Exchange Commission, Immigration and Naturalization Service, Bituminous Coal Division, Federal Employees' Compensation Committee, Interstate Commerce Commission, Department of the Interior,[2] Wage and Hour Division, Patent Office, and Social Security Board.

This mere list of names indicates the tremendous diversity of the subject matter and interests entrusted to these Federal agencies. Our study so far shows fully as great diversity in the facts and problems to which particular procedures must be adjusted. The committee has been increasingly impressed by the danger of premature and facile generalization. It is more than ever convinced that every theory or conclusion must be continually tested by reference to a great variety of data as they are developed, and that in this field no generalization can be safely pushed beyond territory which has been carefully surveyed and mapped. Further, the committee's experience has given it convincing proof that problems concerning notice and pleading, preliminary investigation, intervention, functions of attorneys, and rules of evidence assume greater concreteness and yield more readily to analysis when related to particular subject matters and types of proceedings than when they are stated in the form of generalizations. The same may be said of other matters of administrative procedure, such as questions with respect to oral arguments, briefs, exceptions, proposed findings of fact, proposed reports, and rehearings. Moreover, the individual studies now being made constantly add to the committee's insights by bringing to light relationships of problems and suggesting improvements in procedure which have been tested by experience.

Hence the committee believes that, with its study of the facts only half completed, no useful purpose can be achieved by attempting at this time specific judgment upon the various procedures and suggested procedures which have been the subject of its investigation. It is possible, however, to state certain probabilities raised by its study to date.

First, conscientious students of administrative procedure, both in its adjudicative and in its rule-making aspects, have been skeptical that a single formula or set of formulas can properly control the various and changing situations in which administrative action is present. Our studies have served to reinforce that skepticism. In order to maintain reasonable governmental efficiency and to afford realistic protection to affected private interests, procedural diversities are probably inevitable. The monographs already completed exhibit some of those diversities; for, as reference to those studies will illustrate, the subjects and problems encountered in the various agencies, while sometimes bearing surface resemblances, yield in the presence of facts to deeper and much more significant dissimilarities—dissimilarities which inescapably affect the techniques employed in dealing with them. The committee's inquiries have made it apprehensive that a too rigid prescription of administrative procedures would, by substituting artificial uniformity for essential variety, abolish many procedures which now fully satisfy the convenience and protect the welfare of great numbers of citizens and would defeat the substantive purposes of many congressional enactments.

Yet certain recurring issues seem to arise at least in limited areas. There is reason to hope that these issues can be resolved with a measure of uniformity, and that principles may be established for the guidance of administrative action where it affects private rights. The committee is unwilling, and indeed unable, as yet to indicate with assurance the procedural patterns which it may be able to sketch in its final report. Until detailed studies of the operations of the individual agencies have been completed, so that uniform rules can be prescribed with knowledge of their incidence on each agency, the committee believes that generalization would be premature.

Second, the committee is convinced of the need not only for generalized consideration of broad procedural questions, studied apart from the concrete situations in which they arise, but also, and perhaps even more importantly, for the intensive examination of aspects of procedure which may be peculiar to particular agencies. One commission, for example, has the problem whether or not commissioners, in order that they may more fully consider ultimate decisions, should conserve their time by delegating to subordinates greater responsibility for determining questions which occur in the preliminary stages of proceedings. Another agency has a substantial number of default cases, giving rise in that agency to special problems. Two agencies studied thus far have difficulties with respect to the reconsideration of decisions already rendered. Another is undergoing a sweeping alteration of its basic procedures in an attempt to comply with its interpretation of recent Supreme Court decisions. One bureau is confronted with the question whether the trial-examining system should be replaced by a system calling for final decisions in the field, with the right of appeal to the central office.

Altogether apart from questions of wider import, these matters call for the committee's thoughtful concern. Answers to them, if successfully developed, will constitute a significant contribution to the science of government, for they will perhaps have suggestive values beyond their immediate applications.

Third, in the course of its investigation the committee has found particular administrative procedures which can and should be improved. On such occasions it has stated its criticisms and frankly discussed the purpose and effect of these procedures with the officials of the agency concerned. In many cases these discussions have resulted in differences of opinion as to the wisdom and practicality of changes in procedure. It has not been the impression of the committee in these instances, however, that the criticized procedure was maintained because of indifference or a desire to disregard the basic values which underlie fair administration and decision.

Fourth, the committee believes that a consequence of its work of lasting value will be the stimulation of the agencies themselves toward the improvement of their own procedures. We are much encouraged by knowledge that some agencies, made conscious of procedural problems by the committee's inquiries, have already substantially altered existing practices, either as a result of their own thinking or in accordance with informal suggestions of the committee or its staff.

Fifth, because the volume of work in many agencies which adjudicate controversies has reached large proportions, there has been a growing necessity of delegating to subordinates the function of conducting hearings. In its studies the committee has encountered, in many varied aspects, problems related to the trial examiner. These problems have in the past received relatively little attention. The committee believes that among its most important subjects of investigation are the position of the trial examiner, the personnel filling that position, the limitations which the classification of the position and the resulting salaries have imposed upon obtaining qualified men, and the relationship of the trial examiner to the case which he has heard and to the agency which he has served. There was, prior to the investigations of this committee, but little, if any, information available on these questions which in many agencies go to the very heart of the adjudicative process.

Sixth, the utilization in the rule-making process of methods whereby agencies may obtain information, opinions, and criticisms from those who may be affected by their rules ought to be encouraged. The committee has encountered a number of interesting procedures now actually employed by the several agencies. Here again variety is readily understandable. Regulations governing internal procedure, specifying minimum stock market margin requirements, formulating rules for the construction of oil tankers, and prescribing bookkeeping methods of telegraph and telephone companies obviously present procedural problems to the administrator which vary with the subject matter, the number of persons affected, and the types of interests involved. It is probable that the holding of a public hearing is not the only and sometimes may not be the best method of enabling interested parties to express their views. The committee desires to develop suggestions concerning devices which may appropriately be used in varying circumstances to the advantage of the agencies and of those who are to be guided by regulations.

The progress of the committee's work may then be summarized as follows:

1. Detailed fact studies have been made of a substantial number of the agencies proposed to be studied. The resulting monographs can be made available for public consideration in the immediate future, and new studies can be published from time to time as they are completed.

2. All studies of the various agencies can be completed by the early summer of this year.

3. The committee can be ready for public hearings for the discussion of this material and to obtain the views of the public and the bar during the coming summer.

4. The committee's program contemplates submitting its final report and recommendations to you in the fall of this year.

Respectfully submitted.

DEAN ACHESON,
Chairman for the Committee.

Members of the committee: Dean Acheson, Ralph F. Fuchs, Lloyd K. Garrison, D. Lawrence Groner, Henry M. Hart, Jr., Carl McFarland, James W. Morris, Harry Shulman, E. Blythe Stason, Arthur T. Vanderbilt.

[1] Separate monographs will probably be called for in connection with the Department of Agriculture's procedures under the Perishable Commodities Act, Sugar Act, Commodity Exchange Act, Cotton Marketing Act, Agricultural Marketing Agreements Act, and perhaps others.

[2] Separate monographs may possibly be called for in connection with procedures of the General Land Office, Division of Grazing, Petroleum Conservation Division, Office of Indian Affairs, and perhaps others of the subdivisions of the Interior Department.

LOANS TO FINLAND

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3069) to provide for certain loans to the Republic of Finland by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair state the question. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] to the bill as amended by the unanimous-consent request submitted by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] on Friday last.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to know what the pending amendment is. May it be stated by the clerk?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. After the words "loans to" it is proposed to strike out "any one foreign country"; and after the word "agencies" where it twice occurs, it is proposed to insert "of any one foreign country"; and after the words "made to", it is proposed to strike out "such foreign country and."

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senate has before it at this time a proposal to increase the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. The proposal does not undertake to extend the powers of the Export-Import Bank. It rather limits the powers of the Export-Import Bank so far as loans to any one country or to the nationals or citizens of any one country are concerned, and likewise contains a direct prohibition against loans for the exportation of arms, munitions, or implements of war as defined under the Neutrality Act or by the President in virtue of that act. It likewise contains another restriction; that is, that no loans shall be made which violate international law as construed or as interpreted by the Department of State.

There is no extension of power provided for in the bill, but there is the restriction upon the present powers of the bank to which I have already directed attention. The only thing the bill does, in fact, is, subject to these restrictions, to increase the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. The bill originally provided for an unrestricted loan to Finland in the sum of $60,000,000, but all that was changed by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the changes made by that committee were not modified by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, save with respect to the total loans which might be made to any one nation or to the nationals thereof out of the new money provided as capital.

Mr. President, it is very difficult to discuss this matter without thinking of a loan to Finland, although the bill does not provide for any loan to Finland. As the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] said in the Senate, any one who favors a loan to Finland may point to the bill, if it shall be enacted into law, and say, "I voted for a loan to Finland," and anyone who does not favor a loan to Finland may point to it and say, "I merely voted to increase the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank, and whatever those in charge of the Export-Import Bank may have done is no responsibility of mine beyond the mere fact that I voted for the bill."

I think it may be said, to start with, that there is no money in the bill, to use the language of the Honorable Jesse Jones, for the purchase of arms, munitions, or implements of war for Finland, or China, or any other country. The record is clear and explicit upon that point. Mr. Jones said the Export-Import Bank had never made a loan to finance the exportation of arms, munitions, or implements of war, and would not do so. So that so far as the bill goes, it does not provide for any possible loan in this country to Finland or any other country for the purchase of arms, munitions, or implements of war.

No one wishes to oppose a loan to Finland per se. During the debate in the Senate upon the resolution offered by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] calling for expeditious action upon any effort made by Finland to register her bonds for sale to the American people, I stated my position upon the broad general question involved in the conflict now waging between Finland and Russia. I trust that no one will even suggest that anyone who opposes the pending bill is lacking in sympathy for Finland. Not only did I support the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi, but many of us have been privileged, out of our very scanty personal means, to make contributions to Finland, and will repeat those contributions. But it is quite one thing for individuals to contribute to a foreign nation engaged in war, and another thing for the Government itself to make a loan to a foreign nation engaged in war. There is no objection, so far as the Senate is concerned, to individuals in the United States making loans for the benefit of Finland, and certainly there is no objection to the making of contributions for the benefit of Finland.

Mr. President, I think everyone can recall what a tide of sentiment was running in this country last July and August, how on almost every hand there were those ready to tell us that we would not be able to remain out of the war in Europe, if it should come, and it will be recalled that when war came we were admonished that we would not be able to remain out of it. Expressions of that kind could be heard in high places. One did not have to go outside of official circles in Washington to hear them, and all over the country there was a fear that we might be drawn into the European war.

There were some who then thought we ought to go into the war, and some who now think so. I respect their views. I am not making any quarrel with them at this time. They are entitled to their views. Many of my constituents have said that we should enter the war in Europe and should enter it promptly. Many others put a definite limitation upon the time when we would actually be in the war. But that is beside the question.

The Congress was called into extraordinary session in late September to consider neutrality legislation. I call the attention of the Senate now to the preamble of the Neutrality Act, over which there was a considerable controversy, not only on the floor of the Senate but in the committee of conference between the two Houses. The preamble reads:

> Whereas the United States, desiring to preserve its neutrality in wars between foreign states and desiring also to avoid involvement therein, voluntarily imposes upon its nationals by domestic legislation the restrictions set out in this joint resolution; and
> Whereas by so doing the United States waives none of its own rights or privileges, or those of any of its nationals, under international law, and expressly reserves all the rights and privileges to which it and its nationals are entitled under the law of nations.

And so forth. This preamble was offered and sustained at every point of controversy by the distinguished junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

All the provisions in the Neutrality Act of 1939 were preceded by the declaration that the United States desired to preserve its neutrality and to avoid involvement in any war between foreign states. It likewise definitely asserted our rights and the rights of our nationals, as neutrals, under international law.

Mr. President, the United States cannot assert its rights under international law without at the same time taking upon itself those obligations which rest upon it under international law. I very well know that there are those now who say that international law has become a dead letter. If it is a dead letter, there is no guide for civilized nations, and every war, however trifling, may enlarge itself into a world conflict.

In the Neutrality Act we provided that when war existed between two foreign states, and the President so declared, or the Congress so found and declared, thereafter our ships could not carry passengers or any articles or materials to the ports of the belligerent countries, with exceptions which it is not now necessary to mention. We provided that our citizens should not even travel upon belligerent ships. We also provided that no one should solicit and receive funds in the United States for a belligerent country, save under such conditions as might be prescribed, and the only notable exception was that funds might be solicited among our fellow citizens for a belligerent state, when once a state of war had been declared to exist by the President or the Congress, for the purchase of foodstuffs, drugs, and other supplies necessary to relieve human misery, when such supplies were to be used by organizations having no connection with a belligerent state.

Mr. President, we provided that it should be unlawful, under heavy fine and other penalty, for any person to purchase, or sell, or transfer, or accept a bond or other security of a foreign state engaged in war after a state of war had been declared by the President to exist, and we went as far as we possibly could to do precisely what the Neutrality Act in its preamble declared to be our object, namely, to protect our neutrality and to avoid involvement in the war, at the same time not relinquishing our rights or the rights of our citizens under the law of nations. Need I repeat that when a great country asserts its rights under the law of nations it takes on its shoulders the correlative obligation of meticulously abiding by the law of nations?

When the Neutrality Act was passed, and even before its final passage, when it was evident that it would be passed, the wave of hysteria in the United States began to subside. In official Washington one did not hear the date when we would go into the war. Throughout the country people lost the fear of war. They felt that the United States was taking steps that would, as the Congress itself declared, "preserve" its neutrality.

What is now the situation? Today we are listening to voices that again say that we may be drawn into the war. They are not so loud at the moment, but they may be heard all over the land. They are not so vociferous, let it be said, nor so insistent or persistent, but, nevertheless, already the feeling is growing again that we may be drawn into the European war.

That is the picture, Mr. President; that is the situation. No man can say whether we will finally be drawn into that war, and no man can forecast whether sentiment in this country may be sufficiently strong at any future date to demand our entrance into that war. I do not pretend to forecast that, and do not do so; but I assert with perfect confidence that a step in accordance with strict neutrality is a step against war and away from war. We may not always be able to avoid it even when we walk circumspectly within the letter and spirit of international law, but an unneutral step, a step against well-defined and well-understood precepts of international law, is a step in the direction of war. It may not always lead to war, but it is a step in that direction.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Georgia began his remarks by pointing out that under the provisions of the pending measure war materials could not be purchased with the loan, if one should be made. Let me ask the Senator if it is not true, however, that the whole theory of the Neutrality Act and the basis upon which we passed that act, was that no discrimination could be made between war materials and ordinary articles of commerce? Does not that run all through the Neutrality Act?

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator is correct, and I was about to approach that phase of the discussion.

Mr. President, it is true that no state of war has been declared between Finland and Russia, or between China and Japan. It is true that the strict provisions of the Neutrality Act do not textually apply; but is the United States to violate the very essence and spirit of its own Neutrality Act, and may it do so with impunity?

It is likewise true, as the Senator from Texas brought to our attention, that under the Neutrality Act, when a declaration of war has been made, we cannot make a loan in this country, and the Government itself cannot make a sale of arms, munitions, or implements of war to any country involved in that war.

It is also true that the Neutrality Act went much further. It provided that a sale of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by a private citizen of the United States to a private citizen of another country would be conclusively held to be a sale to the country itself of which that private citizen was a national and to which the shipment was made.

So, Mr. President, while there is not a declared state of war between Finland and Russia, and China and Japan, there is an actual state of war between Finland and Russia. That is the very reason why the pending bill is here—not in its present form but as originally introduced. It was introduced to relieve Finland, which was fighting with its back to the wall. It was introduced to help Finland in her unequal struggle with Russia. There is an actual war there. Do we preserve our neutrality for the purpose of preventing our involvement in war when, merely because there has not been a technical declaration of war, we undertake to do, and propose to do, the very things that have been outlawed by the Neutrality Act which we passed last November?

Not only that, but the Secretary of War came to the Congress and made his whole plea for the change and modification of our then existing Neutrality Act, which prohibited the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war at all to a warring nation, upon the basis of real neutrality. I am sure the President remembers it. The final basis of the Secretary of State's plea, adopted literally by the President of the United States when he sent his message to the Congress in extraordinary session, came down to this: That it is unneutral for this great Nation to deny to any neutral or friendly nation the right to come into our markets and buy of us anything we may have to sell. It was not claimed that we did not have the power to say, "We will not let you buy our arms, ammunition, and implements of war." They said that basically such an act was unneutral. That was the philosophy of the Secretary of State. That was the basis upon which he rested his whole plea.

It was said by those who opposed the proposal, of course, that if we changed our law in the middle of the stream, so to speak, we would enable France and Great Britain to obtain arms, munitions, and implements of war which Germany, lacking in ships and not having command of the sea, could not obtain. All good and well. But the Secretary of State said, as his statement will disclose, that down at bottom every neutral state has the right to come to another neutral state and say, "We are now engaged in war with a third party. You are violating neutrality in its deepest sense, in its truest meaning, when you deny us the power to come within your borders and buy anything that you sell ordinarily and generally to neutral countries."

Mr. President, if a state of war were declared between Finland and Russia, Mr. Hoover and no one else could even solicit funds for general purposes for either belligerent from our citizens. But it has not been declared, and funds have been solicited and are being solicited and have been contributed in no inconsequential amount. If a declaration of war were made, not a bond of the Finnish Government or of the Russian Government could be offered for sale in the United States. But we have said that Finland at least may offer her securities here for sale, and we have called on an agency of our Government to expedite the handling or the clearing of Finnish bonds if Finland should offer to sell them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I do not understand that the mere declaration of war between Finland and Russia would cause the Neutrality Act to become effective. There are three conditions listed in section 1, first——

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not want to get into any argument on that point. Of course, if the President issued his proclamation the act would be effective.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Yes; if he issued it; but he does not have to issue it merely because there is a declaration of war.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I did not say that. I said, "if the President issues a proclamation declaring the existence of war."

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Yes; if the President issues his proclamation. But he does not have to issue it unless he finds it necessary to do so to promote the security, or to preserve the peace of the United States, or to protect the lives of the citizens of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes. I am not quarreling with the Senator about that; but I said, if the President should issue a proclamation declaring the existence of a state of war, every line of the Neutrality Act would go into effect.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. If he issued a proclamation; yes.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator may quarrel as long as he pleases about mere language. If the President issued his proclamation or his declaration, every line of the Neutrality Act would go into effect. Now the fact is that he has not done so, although a war exists. The President probably is justified—indeed, I shall go so far as to say that, in my opinion, he is justified—in not issuing the proclamation. Why? Not because war does not exist; not because we are relieved of any obligation resting upon us as a neutral nation under international law—not at all—but solely because he does not think this particular war endangers the safety or security of our citizens, or makes it necessary for him to issue the proclamation. I believe he is right in that.

But, Mr. President, in the passage of the Neutrality Act we asserted our insistence upon our neutrality. We said we were passing the act in order to preserve that neutrality, and for the single purpose of keeping the United States out of war. A great nation cannot violate the spirit and the soul of its own action without endangering itself. No great nation can afford to do so.

Mr. President, I now come to a consideration which I wish to present to the Senate. I do not think the State Department is out of harmony with the interpretation of international law. Indeed, I do not see how it can be, because there is no ground for difference of opinion. Usually upon any question of law, domestic or international, there is the possibility of dispute. I wish to read what Mr. Hackworth, of the State Department, legal adviser to the Secretary of State, said before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate in answer to my question. I read from page 37 of the hearings. I said to Mr. Hackworth:

I believe that it may now be said that loans have been made directly to foreign countries, and since some of these countries are now in war, the question arises whether making these loans to belligerents is an unneutral act.

Mr. HACKWORTH. I think you want to look to the time when the loan was made to see whether the country was belligerent at that time or not. There is very strong authority for the proposition that a neutral cannot make a loan to a belligerent. However, by the convention concluded at Habana in 1928, an exception was made to that general proposition, to the effect that loans could be made by a neutral for the purchase of food supplies and raw materials.

Senator GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. HACKWORTH. That convention was approved by the Senate and has been ratified by the United States.

Senator GEORGE. Yes; I think there is no question as to that at all; loans made for ordinary peacetime purposes, for food supplies and other necessities, including drugs—I believe it included drugs.

Mr. HACKWORTH. It specifies food supplies and raw materials.

Senator GEORGE. I think it would be construed as including anything of the nature or character of a drug. Aside from that modification, we have recognized no other modification of the broad principle that an unrestricted loan to a belligerent is an unneutral act?

Mr. HACKWORTH. No; we have recognized no other qualification so far as I know.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not true that the Convention of Habana applied only to Latin American countries?

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. CONNALLY. So it does not affect the general law.

Mr. GEORGE. It does not affect the general law. I was about to make that distinction, Mr. President. It was a convention between the United States and certain Latin American countries, or countries in the Western Hemisphere. I do not believe it necessary to labor the point that the Western Hemisphere has always been considered apart from general principles of international law so far as we are concerned. We have asserted the Monroe Doctrine, and we have taken other positions which, of course, take this convention entirely out of international law.

However, I shall come back to that question a little later.

I asked Mr. Hackworth another question:

Senator GEORGE. I believe the question first arose with us during John Adams' administration, did it not?

Mr. HACKWORTH. It did, with respect to a loan to France.

Senator GEORGE. There was a very definite pronouncement then that a loan to France would be an unneutral act?

Mr. HACKWORTH. That is correct.

Senator GEORGE. That, of course, was prior to any of the embargo acts, which came along subsequently in the Jefferson administration.

Mr. HACKWORTH. The same question came up again with respect to underwriting a loan by one of the South American countries which was then in revolt against Spain, and we said that we could not underwrite such a loan.

Senator GEORGE. This bill as it stands, and with the restrictions which the Export-Import Bank has placed around its loans, confining them to foodstuffs, raw agricultural products, and processed articles other than arms, munitions, and so forth, is not, of course, on its face a violation of neutrality as we interpret it.

Mr. HACKWORTH. I do not think so.

Later, in reply to a question by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], Mr. Hackworth made a further statement.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I think the question which the Senator has just read, which he asked Mr. Hackworth, should be clarified in one respect. The Senator said:

This bill as it stands, and with the restrictions which the Export-Import Bank has placed around its loans, confining them to foodstuffs, raw agricultural products, and processed articles other than arms, munitions, and so forth, is not, of course, on its face a violation of neutrality as we interpret it.

Mr. Hackworth said:

I do not think so.

I wish to know to what bill the Senator was referring. Was it the original bill, or was it the bill which the Banking and Currency Committee had reported as a substitute for the original bill?

Mr. GEORGE. It was the substitute bill.

Mr. BROWN. Then it is practically the bill we now have before us?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. Which the Senator did not then think and, as I understand, does not now think, is a violation of our neutrality.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes. I shall be pleased to discuss that point shortly.

In reply to the question asked by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], Mr. Hackworth made this statement:

It seems to me, Senator, that the situation is safeguarded by the language that no loan shall be made in violation of international law as interpreted by the Department of State. If a loan came up it would be very appropriate for the Department of State to try to inquire into the purpose of the loan and to decide whether it would violate international law, and if the Department found that it would violate international law, I take it that the Department would oppose it.

Mr. President, let us look at the law as it actually stands. Solely for convenience I read from the American Journal of International Law, a recent compilation, as of July 1939. However, I read no statement which is not verified either in the text or by myself outside the text. I read the following language from page 233:

A neutral state in the exercise of its neutral rights and in the performance of its neutral duties shall be impartial and refrain from discrimination between belligerents.

* * * The principle itself is inherent in the nature of neutrality. Nevertheless, this standard was not fully accepted until at least the end of the eighteenth century. Prior to that time it was considered permissible for a state to assist one belligerent without abandoning neutrality (with citations). * * *

The United States in 1793 committed itself to the doctrine of impartiality, thus strengthening the precedents set by the Italian states a few years before (citing authority) * * * and by the members of the Armed Neutrality of 1780. But even the Government of the United States for some time admitted that an unequal advantage could be given to one belligerent if a prior treaty provided for some special privilege.

Coming to the specific question before the Senate in the consideration of the bill before us, on page 235 of the compilation from which I am reading there appears the following broad, general language under article 5:

A neutral state shall abstain from supplying to a belligerent assistance for the prosecution of the war.

Under that broad proposition it is expressly stated that—

The neutral state is forbidden—
(a) To deliver to the belligerent, directly or indirectly, or for any reason whatever, ships of war, munitions, or any other war material; (b) to grant it loans, or to open credits for it during the duration of the war.

Mr. President, I read from the same compilation on page 237:

In 1798 and 1816 the United States declared that a loan by a neutral state to a belligerent government was illegal.

Citing no less an authority upon that proposition than Dr. John Bassett Moore. In my humble judgment, Dr. John Bassett Moore is the foremost contemporary American authority on international law. I should like to read the exact text and see how explicit it is, and how without qualification. I read from the Digest of International Law, volume 7. Dr. Moore says:

With reference to the loan of money which was solicited from the United States by the French Government, in 1798, through the American envoys in Paris, the United States took the ground that such a loan would be a violation of neutrality. This is cited with approval by Chancelor Kent.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield for a question.

Mr. PEPPER. I was going to ask the Senator if he had given, in the course of his remarks, any definition of a belligerent state?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I have not.

Mr. President, without citing additional authority upon this question, I want to make a further statement.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I merely wish to read from the American Journal of International Law for July 1939, from which the Senator has read, another observation occurring on page 211, beginning with line 5:

Regardless of theoretical considerations or legal definitions, if the states of the world choose to regard a formal armed conflict between two of their number as not being "war" and particularly if the contestants themselves choose to take the same view, the law of neutrality is not in effect. That is a necessary conclusion from current international practice.

Mr. GEORGE. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. WAGNER. From page 211.

Mr. GEORGE. I have not examined that text, and I do not even know what was under discussion at that point.

Mr. WAGNER. The question of belligerency.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well. I have no controversy with the broad general statement, of course.

Mr. President, I refer again to our own Neutrality Act. We declared it to be our purpose to preserve our neutrality and to avoid involvement in war. There are innumerable writers of the newspaper school, as there are men in public office, who will say—and anyone is entitled to that view—that our country will not necessarily be led into war by the making of a loan to Finland or the making of a loan to any other country that actually is engaged in war, though it escapes the technical definition of a belligerent because it does not desire to declare that it is at war, possibly for the very purpose of securing from this great country aid and assistance. Certainly our country will not necessarily be led into war. No one has asserted—I have not asserted—that the action proposed to be taken will lead to war; but I do say, Mr. President, when we hide behind the mere failure of a country to declare what all mankind knows to be the truth; that is, that a state of war exists, in order that the United States may violate the essential principle of neutrality and furnish to such state arms, munitions, and implements of war or money with which they may buy these things, that then we are taking a definite step toward war.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I am sure, if the Senator will yield to me, that he does not mean to assert that the pending bill does any of the things which he has just detailed. It does not propose to ship any munitions of war; it does not propose to lend any money for that purpose. That is expressly denied by the language of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, Mr. President, the Senator has an amendment to the bill, which I do not know whether he will offer, providing for a loan of money outright without any restrictions or qualifications. I must, of course, discuss the matter in the light of realities.

Mr. BROWN. I will say to the Senator that my original bill was, doubtless, subject to the criticism he has just made if we lay aside entirely the question of whether or not a war exists; but in introducing that bill, and, in the process of having it heard by two committees, I have been educated to a considerable extent, and it is not, I will say to the Senator, my intention now to propose the amendment to which he refers. I had intended to discuss that rather more fully after the Senator shall have finished his speech, but I have come to the conclusion that I do not want to do anything that would, in the slightest, be subject to the criticism that we are acting in violation of our neutrality by anything we do in connection with Finland.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I may say frankly to the Senator that that has very great effect upon what I am saying, because it is not now my contention that the substitute bill as reported is itself and on its face any violation of our neutrality. I will go even further than that and say, while the loans may be made and the proceeds of the loans may indirectly be used for the purchase of arms, munitions, or implements of war; that, I think, is a matter over which we would not be called on to exercise control; and, so far as the bill on its face is concerned, I have not asserted, and do not assert, that it is a violation of our neutral rights.

Mr. BROWN. I am glad to have the Senator make that statement.

Mr. GEORGE. But I should like to say, because the question may arise at a subsequent time, that I think the safest course for our country to pursue under all the circumstances is to live within the spirit, even though technically we might be justified in stepping without the spirit, of our own Neutrality Act, and also to live within the spirit of what is rightly considered to be the law of nations, as we understand it to be.

I said, Mr. President, in answer to a statement by the Senator from Texas, that the Habana Convention of 1928 did not, of course, affect the status of international law, and I am sure that that statement must be taken as correct. Yet international law is made up and grows out of treaties and understandings and covenants and agreements; it springs out of the best thought and out of the course of conduct and the policy pursued by enlightened peoples and governments through long centuries of time. The Habana Convention has, in my honest judgment, some application to us so far as concerns the furnishing of food supplies and other necessities to relieve human suffering, not embracing, of course, arms or munitions or implements of war.

I wish to make it perfectly understood, Mr. President, that I do not think, for a moment, that Mr. Jones or Mr. Moore of the State Department or anyone else connected with the Export-Import Bank, as trustees, would depart from their uniform custom of confining their loans to the financing of exports of surplus agriculture and industrial products of this country, and I am quite sure that they are in perfect good faith when they say that none of the bank's money will be used at any time for the purpose of financing the exportation of arms, munitions, and implements of war. I accept that statement as being made absolutely in the best of faith.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that point, I may say, referring to his statement of a moment ago that the failure to recognize a state of war to exist may be for the very purpose of permitting certain sales to be made, that when Mr. Hackworth was before the committee I asked him whether any other neutral nation in the world had recognized a state of war to exist between Finland and Russia, and he said that not one neutral nation has recognized that a state of war exists. So all other neutral countries in the world have taken exactly the same attitude as has our country.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I believe, if the Senator from North Carolina will permit me to proceed for a moment, that he did qualify that statement to the effect that the League of Nations itself took cognizance of the existence of the war and had the Russian Government before it or had invited it to come before it.

Mr. WAGNER. And the Russian Government stated its position.

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes; I understand that.

Mr. WAGNER. Perhaps I had better read the testimony.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator may put it in if he wishes to later.

Mr. WAGNER. Very well.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not quarreling now about that, but I can see, as anyone else can see, that a country may even fail to declare that it is in a state of war with another country because it may desire to secure aid and assistance from some neutral nation. Technically, I am not contending that a condition of belligerency actually exists until there has been a declaration or an acknowledgment not by neutrals but by the countries themselves involved that they are engaged in war.

Mr. President, I assert that under our Neutrality Act the President of the United States could declare that a state of war exists between Russia and Finland if he found that it was necessary for him to make such a proclamation or declaration in order to preserve the peace and security or to protect the lives of citizens of the United States. I submit that the mere failure of countries actually engaged in war themselves to admit that they are in war, or to follow their action by a definite proclamation of war, is not binding upon the President of the United States nor upon the Congress of the United States under our own Neutrality Act. It is the spirit of that act, and it is what that act invokes, that I am here invoking in the consideration of this question.

Now, a few general observations and I am through.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I think the Senator misunderstood the point I made. The point I tried to make was that, according to the testimony before our committee, every other neutral in the world besides ourselves has failed to recognize that a state of war exists. In other words, the attitude of other neutrals is exactly the attitude of the United States.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, Mr. President; I have no doubt of that. I presume it has not become necessary for other neutrals to consider whether or not a state of war exists; but I say to the Senator that, as he well knows, if any question arises under maritime law in the courts of admiralty in this country, they will consider that a state of war exists between Russia and Finland. That is a part of international law and a great body of international law; but I am not arguing upon that point. That, at most, would be a mere technical distinction which I do not care to argue at all.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to make a few general observations in line with what I have already said.

The Constitution vests in the Congress alone the power to declare war. This power should remain free and untrammeled in all circumstances. Any course which limits or restricts the independent judgment of the Congress on the supreme issue of war and peace is a direct infringement of the constitutional power vested in the Congress alone. The Congress at all times should be free to decide the momentous issue of war or peace without embarrassment because of something previously done by the executive branch of the Government, and without the necessity of compromising its own freedom of action in order to avoid what otherwise would seem an unseemly conflict with action previously taken by the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. President, that has a direct bearing upon what I said in the Senate a few days ago—that if we are going to make loans to Finland or to any other foreign country engaged in war, actual or undeclared, the Congress should do it. In my candid opinion, it should not be left in the hands of an agency of the Government, because the action taken by the agency of government may be an embarrassment to the Congress itself when it is subsequently called upon to pass upon the question of peace or war.

No thoughtful student of constitutional government can put entirely out of mind the unfortunate circumstance that a President of the United States directed our armed forces into territory beyond the boundaries of the State of Texas and beyond the boundaries of that State as claimed by that State, and thus exposed our armed forces to an advanced position of danger. Thereafter it was impossible to resist the cry that to all intents and purposes we were at war, because the lives of our soldiers were imperiled; and so we went to war. John C. Calhoun, among others on this floor, stood upon unassailable ground when he declared that if we were resolved to go to war with Mexico, it was not at the same time necessary for us to make war upon the American Constitution.

No country, and particularly no free country, goes to war in one stride. It moves cautiously, because public sentiment must support it, step by step, stage by stage, until one day we may find ourselves in a position where we cannot well turn back. A loan to Finland within itself, even if it were a direct loan of the entire amount involved in this bill, is not of great consequence. Likewise, the same thing may be said of China. But if the fury of war grows more intense, and if the hour comes when the great cities of Paris and of London and the area embraced within the little island of England and the nation of France itself are actually threatened, sentiment in this country, generally sympathetic with the cause of Britain and France, may well drive us nearer to further loans and to additional steps that we do not want to take.

So, Mr. President, I assert that the broad constitutional power which vests in the Congress the sole and exclusive right to determine the issue of peace and war should remain always unembarrassed by previous or concurrent Executive action which may embarrass it or otherwise force it into collision with action taken by another department of Government.

Mr. President, I now address myself to another principle which I wish to state. We cannot advocate the policy of punishing another nation for conduct not directed against us or our vital interests, however flagrant or reprehensible, however outrageous, however condemned by the moral judgment of mankind, unless we accept the doctrine of collective security as the basis of our foreign policy. I state unequivocally that when this Nation, whatever may be the purity of its motives and the strength of its high purpose, undertakes to punish another nation or to enter into the wars of other powers for the purpose of punishing wrongdoing, whenever we abandon the basis of our foreign policy that we will defend against acts that are directed against us or against our vital interests, we must go to the nebulous policy of collective security which has been often pressed in these latter days.

Mr. President, whatever the shortcomings of international law as furnishing a guide for national action, there is no other procedure so deeply imbedded in the minds and hearts and practices of mankind, and nothing better has been offered to replace it. We have tried to supplement it by additional limitations upon acts of our own citizens, but without abandoning it.

Let no one assume that we must condone wrong in order to remain neutral. I know that loose statement is made. We have the power, and in the political sense the right, and I will say in extreme circumstances the moral right, to become unneutral and to enter any conflict which may arise in any quarter of the globe; but we cannot be half in and half out of someone else's quarrel. We cannot be partly neutral and partly unneutral. If the circumstances arise, we shall find it most difficult, if not impossible, to avoid going all the way when we have taken a definite step in the direction of unneutrality; I will not use the stronger term "intervention." A great people cannot follow a vacillating and an uncertain and a whimsical course. The plainest principles of international morality require that we advise not merely the belligerents, those actually involved in war, but all neutral nations that we are unneutral when we reach the conclusion that the exigencies of the case compel us to be such, and compel us to an unneutral course of conduct.

When all is said, neutrality leads away from war, as I said in the beginning. It may not, in every case, enable us honorably to avoid it. Unneutrality and unneutral action lead inevitably toward war, although they may not in every case actually lead us into war.

Now, Mr. President, I have done; but I want to read from Dr. John Bassett Moore upon this question that is so frequently pressed now upon the Congress. He says:

> The supposition that the law of neutrality imposes moral indifference to the merits of armed conflicts and makes any intervention in them unlawful, I can only call baseless. The law of neutrality—

Says Dr. Moore—

> does not require a neutral state to remain so. A neutral state may, if it should so desire, enter the conflict; but it cannot be both in and out. The law of neutrality merely applies the rule of common honesty. Parties to an armed conflict are entitled to know who are in it and who are not. No matter how it is viewed, the demand that the law of neutrality shall be considered as obsolete is so visionary, so confused, so somnambulistic—> that no concession to it can be rationally made.

Says Dr. Moore—

Mr. President, if this Nation follows the course it has pursued for more than a century, not of avoiding its obligations and its responsibilities, but of assuming them under the well-established principles of law, assuming all of its obligations, and insisting likewise upon its rights, except when we have by our own Neutrality Act put an end to those rights, and circumscribed them for the purpose of avoiding involvement in war, we shall be in a much safer position, we shall stand upon much more certain ground than if we allow our sympathies for small nations or weak nations to sweep us into some congressional action which may subsequently embarrass us, and embarrass us greatly, if the unfortunate conflict in Europe should go to its final natural conclusion.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I send to the desk and will call up in a moment an amendment which I should like to have the clerk read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 12, it is proposed to strike out "$200,000,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$150,000,000."

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the Export-Import Bank was formed originally for the purpose of promoting and helping in the financing of American trade. Its $100,000,000 capital—as a matter of fact, I think it was only $25,000,000 in the beginning—was intended as a revolving fund. It was intended as a short-term credit proposition. It was intended to finance private transactions, not sales to foreign governments. There was no particular limitation as to governments, but certainly when the law was enacted originally it was not intended to be an act to encourage loans to governments.

Since that time, however, it has developed until today practically all the loans are made either to governments or to government-owned corporations, or they are indirectly guaranteed by governments. The result is that the $100,000,000, or a large part of it, is frozen, simply because the loans are of that character. They are being paid back, but paid back very slowly, not at all with the speed with which credits to private interests are repaid. The request for additional capital is in effect an effort to have us say to the Export-Import Bank, or to the administration, "You may lend money to any government in the world, as you choose." I think that policy is wrong. I spoke last year at length, during the debate on the spend-lend bill, against the increase in capital provided for at that time.

As a matter of fact, this increase in capital is equivalent to an increase in general Government expenses. All of us are interested in not being forced to increase the debt limit by a deficit, and one of the ways by which that is to be prevented is in calling back from various Government agencies capital not needed by them. We asked Mr. Jones, before the Committee on Banking and Currency, whether the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would be called on to pay back any of its capital, and he said that he was going to be called on to pay back $200,000,000, and he stated that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had $200,000,000 which it did not need. Then we asked him whether he could also put up this $100,000,000 for the Export-Import Bank, for it is from that institution that the contemplated increase of capital of the Export-Import Bank is to be made. He replied—

> Yes, in addition to paying back to the Government $200,000,000, we can use another hundred million, without hampering the operations of the R. F. C. to finance the Export-Import Bank.

Obviously, if we require him to put up only $50,000,000, as I propose, the other $50,000,000 can be paid back to the Government, and he can reduce to that extent the permanent debt of the United States, or avoid the necessity for increasing it beyond the debt limit. So this is very largely a question of direct appropriation, although it does not appear and will not appear among the Budget expenditures.

Mr. President, the Export-Import Bank today is largely lending to governments. They have outstanding today $65,000,000, and $59,000,000 in addition is committed, making a total of $124,000,000; but commitments are not usually all called for.

Senators are familiar with a great many of the loans. There was a loan to China; there is a loan to Nicaragua of $2,500,000; a loan to Panamanian credits, the Republic of Panama, of $2,500,000, and a loan to Paraguay of approximately $3,400,000.

In most cases that money is used for the purpose of financing the purchase of goods from the United States; but that does not necessarily make the policy a sound one. Our experience with loans to South America certainly shows that such loans are not likely, in the long run, to be paid. Of course, current payments are being kept up, but when finally we stop lending, when finally it becomes apparent we are not going to lend any more, I see no particular reason why those governments should treat such loans, after they are 2 or 3 years old, any differently from the way in which they treat other loans. Today South American countries owe to individuals in this country $1,200,000,000, which is in default, and is not being paid.

The whole policy of promoting foreign trade by lending money to governments I think is a mistake, because those credits are not good, and there is no possible way in which we can enforce loans to governments. We are not going to war to do it, and that is the only way they can be enforced; and if these governments know that is the only way in which they can be enforced, they are going sooner or later to take the position which all our European debtors have taken, that they simply will not pay the debts which they owe.

It is all very well to say it increases foreign trade; but of course it is a mere drop in the bucket. The whole amount of $100,000,000 is only 4 percent of our total foreign trade for 1 year. It amounts to practically nothing in increasing the exports of the United States. If it did amount to something it would be just like financing them through the export of silver, or the receipt of any other useless product. The promissory notes of these governments are, in fact, of little value. There is no use in promoting export trade if we are not going to be paid for it.

We had an example after the war of a tremendous amount of private credits, four or five billion dollars, used in building up a great export trade which we thought was permanent. Then it appeared that the loans were not going to be paid, and as soon as that became apparent all that export trade disappeared, and the result was a complete collapse in the particular industries which were relying upon that trade. If export trade is not on a sound basis of exchange of commodities, then we might as well give up that export trade altogether. Unless we can promote that kind of export trade, I do not see how we can expect a very substantial boom in export trade through the lending of money to other people.

I may say that the Democrats themselves strongly criticized the policy which built up export trade through credit during the twenties, and I think that was one of the proper criticisms they made. Yet, now they are proposing that we build up export trade through the extension of credit.

Mr. President, the actual amount required for the loan to Finland, if the proposed action is justified on that ground, is $20,000,000. Yet we are being asked to supply $100,000,000. There is a suggestion that some of the money is to go to China, there is a suggestion that some of it will go to Norway. In any event, we are asked to give carte blanche to the administration to lend the other $80,000,000 wherever they choose to lend it. It is a question of foreign policy which the Congress should determine. We never have loaned money to governments except in very special cases, and the whole power should be terminated, as proposed in the Danaher amendment. If any loan to a government is to be made, it should come before Congress for determination as to the particular amount and the particular circumstances of the particular loan.

Personally, I am willing that money be loaned to Finland. So long as the Russians say they are not at war, I think they are estopped from saying to us that we should not lend to Finland. We would be perfectly willing to lend if they were not at war with Russia, if Russia had not attacked them. Why should the fact that they have been wantonly attacked make any difference?

It seems to me that a Finnish loan is justified. I do not see any breach of neutrality involved. In this particular case there is no possible issue involved except the freedom of a small struggling nation, and the United States has always sympathized with such causes. We helped the Spanish-American countries when they sought their freedom from Spain. We went to war with Spain in order to free Cuba. We have always sympathized with a country struggling for its freedom, and in this case there is no possible confusion of issues; there is no possible question as to what the war is about. I am as strongly opposed as possible to becoming involved, through loans or in any other way, in the European War. The issues are complicated, they are involved with all kinds of different questions, they are involved with all kinds of European prejudices. We cannot possibly get into that struggle without becoming involved in a tremendous war in which we would have to put forth our entire effort. But so far as a Finnish loan is concerned, I cannot see how it can possibly lead to war, and it certainly is a reasonable gesture of friendship for a small nation, which alone among all the nations of Europe has paid its debt to the United States. Finland has paid us five and a half million dollars.

I object to the general policy of authorizing loans to be made at the discretion of the Executive to South American countries, or to any country in the world. If the bill could be reduced merely to the one question of a loan to Finland, I should be very glad to vote for it. Even if Senators are in favor of a loan to Finland, certainly they can vote to reduce the amount which is proposed. If the amendment which I shall offer when the time comes, is adopted, then there will be plenty of money for a loan to Finland, and the Export-Import Bank will be provided with that small amount of additional liquid capital which they need if they are to confine their efforts to financing American trade for individual exporters and in rapid turnover transactions, in promoting American trade in a natural way, and building it up on a permanent basis, instead of building it up with Government loans which will be merely shifting sands when it comes to the development of a permanent trade.

I hope therefore that my proposed amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWARTZ in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, perhaps nothing more important will come before the Congress at this session than the measure which is now pending; for, because of conditions which prevail throughout the world, the attitude of this Government, after having passed the Neutrality Act at the recent special session, is being watched, and will be watched with great care and particularity. Our neutrality has been announced to the world, and the limit to which we would go to maintain that neutrality has been announced by statute, from the rostrum, and from the legislative halls.

I want to help Finland. The question is, How can we give that help intelligently and honestly?

The bill before the Senate at this time was introduced with a title which naturally arrested the interest of the people of this country and of the world, because if we as a Government were to make a loan to warring countries abroad, then that loan, however small it might be, to whatever country it might be extended, would be an entering wedge by which a precedent would be established, and the question of how far we would go with the policy would be one for future consideration. If we could lend and would lend to warring nations abroad, even though a declaration of war had not been formally made, then indeed we would be called upon in the not distant future to make far more extended loans to countries with respect to which a declaration of war had been made, or perhaps to belligerent nations with respect to which no declaration of war had been made.

If the proposed loan goes forward as was originally intended by the bill, as a loan to Finland, however much we desire to see Finland successful in her life-and-death struggle, and if the bill is approved by the Congress of the United States, then there is no reason why Great Britain, which is at war today and which claims blood relationship to us, which claims that we belong to the same tongue and the same ancestry, should not come forward as she did at the outset of the World War, and ask for extended credits and loans.

If we go into the lending business there is no limit, because as time goes on and the holocaust of war continues, as it promises to continue, no one can say what nations may be involved in the not distant future, nor how much we, trying to keep ourselves neutral, may be called upon to contribute to a condition which was one of the impelling conditions which led us into the World War. If, at the outset of the World War, we had remained away from agencies which loaned the credit of this country to the warring nations, I say without much fear of contradiction that today we should not have row on row of white crosses in Flanders fields. We should not have throughout the length and breadth of this country hospitals where boys are now dying who wish they might have died upon the field of battle rather than to have lingered, maimed and tortured, through 21 years.

Mr. President, I say without a doubt that our action with reference to this bill as it is today, is a momentous action, because it sets a precedent under a subterfuge. Better a thousand times that we had remained steadfast with the title of the bill as it was introduced by the able Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN]. Better a thousand times that we had said that we would consider the proposal to make an out-and-out loan to some country. Then at least we should have been honest with ourselves. We should have been honest with the people of this country and with the other countries of the world.

The history of the bill is most interesting, because when the bill went to the Committee on Banking and Currency everything after the enacting clause was stricken out. Everything that pertained to a loan to Finland, and everything that even squinted at Finland was eliminated from the bill. Today it comes before the Senate after having gone through the Committee on Banking and Currency and the Committee on Foreign Relations. It bears today no resemblance to the bill which was introduced by the Senator from Michigan. It has no portion which even looks like the bill which was introduced by the Senator from Michigan.

What are we doing? Are we trying to fool ourselves? Are we trying to fool the people of this country? Are we trying to fool the people of Finland? Are we trying to fool the people of the world? The bill proposes to increase the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank of Washington from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. It says nothing about a loan to Finland. Mr. Jesse Jones, in testifying before the Committee on Foreign Relations, in no way positively declared that a loan would be made to Finland. He based his testimony on conjecture, upon Finland's ability to pay, as he says.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the able Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. The Senator mentions Jesse Jones. It might be well to recall that that able gentleman made a statement the other day saying that it was our own fault—America's fault—that Europe did not pay her debts, because we had loaned them too much. That is a peculiar kind of reasoning in view of the fact that we are now proposing to lend Europe still more and in view of the fact that these were the gentlemen who were so cocksure Europe would pay back all loans. We made them loans on the insistence of these Wilsonians, and now they blame the country. That is a fine alibi for those who share the European war loan guilt.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I read the statement by the able and very well qualified Mr. Jones, who represents the money-lending power of the Government and its various agencies. I thought it was a startling statement. Yet history bears him out to a great extent, because, for some reason or other, the countries which sought and obtained money from the Treasury of this country at a time when they said they were battling to make the world safe for democracy have, since contracting those debts, had no blush when they called us Uncle Shylock. They did not falter in denouncing us. After our troops had left the fields of battle, after the Versailles Treaty had been accomplished, there was no denunciatory term to which they did not resort in describing this Government; and they have been resorting to such terms up to the present hour.

I mention the expression of Mr. Jones, to which the Senator from Minnesota refers, merely to come back to the thought which I expressed in the first instance, namely, that this is a momentous measure because, as I view it, it is an entering wedge to permit loans which may hereafter be made. They will not be under the guise of the Export-Import Bank, either, because if the Export-Import Bank of Washington sees fit to make the proposed loan, then in the not distant future some other agency will be called upon to make other loans.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator realizes that no such loans as he is now discussing could be made unless the agency, the administration, or someone came back to Congress and obtained authority to make such loans. Is not that a fact?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is true. That is the reason why I shall vote against the pending bill in its present form. I wish to nip in the bud the movement which would make it possible for agencies to come back to Congress and ask for other similar loans.

Mr. BROWN. Of course, the responsibility would be entirely ours if anyone should come back and ask for such authority. We would have the right to say "Yes" or "No," and the Senator knows that the answer would be "No."

Mr. McCARRAN. I want the answer to be "No" to begin with. Then I shall know that it will be "No" in the future. I want the answer to be emphatically "No." When I say that, may I express further myself in this wise? I do not believe there is in this country today anyone more sympathetic with the struggle that is being made by Finland than is the junior Senator from Nevada. I come from a race whose history in a small country has been marked for countless years by a struggle for individual human liberty, and it is natural for me to sympathize with every country, especially a small one, that struggles for individual human liberty and for the rights of freedom. So every drop of my blood renders sympathy to Finland.

I voted the other day for the resolution offered by the able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] because I thought then, as I think now, that if the American people should see fit to make individual contributions toward the cause of any foreign nation or toward any other worthy measure, they should have the avenue and the opportunity whereby they might so express themselves. So if Finland, under that resolution, saw fit to come before the Securities and Exchange Commission and ask to have its bonds legalized for flotation in this country, then, I think that the processes should be expedited. So I voted for that measure which I then thought, and think now, points to the only proper way by which the people of this country should make loans to nations abroad, namely, by individual contributions, in nowise involving this Government nor involving our neutrality.

It is not a question of a $60,000,000 loan to Finland. If the bill should come back here in its original form, with a provision for a $60,000,000 loan to Finland, I venture the assertion that it would receive the support of Senators who are going to vote against it today. It now bears no resemblance to such a measure. It even calls upon a different agency of the Government. The bill introduced by the able Senator from Michigan authorized the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make a loan of $60,000,000 to Finland. The pending bill does not mention Finland; it does not mention any other country. It simply permits an agency of the Government to lend the money of this country, the money of this Government, without regard to the nation to which the loan may be made. So we let down the bars and abdicate the authority and the power and the responsibility that is ours.

Recurring to the question propounded by the Senator from Michigan a moment ago, wherein he suggested that any application for a loan will be our responsibility, again I favor exercising our responsibility now, because it is just as important now and just as imminent as it will be 6 months from now when a greater trend of war may be upon the world.

Mr. President, I shall vote against the pending bill in its present form. While I would vote for any measure that would aid Finland in its present struggle, without involving the neutrality of this country, I say again, as I expressed myself at the time we had before us the neutrality bill, there may be sympathy for any nation that is suffering, but our greatest sympathy belongs here at home, and our Nation should so conduct itself that when sanity again returns to the warring peoples abroad, as it will return—and those peoples, subjects of tyrannous and benighted governments, are looking for a leadership—they will turn their eyes across the water to a powerful nation having democracy as its form of government, and will thank God for the judgment exercised by our people in refusing to become involved and in maintaining such a position that we may not only be the arbiter of the world's disputes but at that hour may hold aloft the torch which will guide the bleeding and torn world along avenues leading to a better civilization which will prevail for centuries to come.

Mr. President, the heart of America throbs in sympathy for Finland. America today is furnishing millions of dollars in private contributions toward Finnish welfare; but the Government of the United States, under its neutrality policy, has no business to break down that policy in the interest of Finland, or any other country, because, if we depart from that policy and lend money to Finland, then we may, with propriety, be called upon—and with emphasis, if you please—to lend money to Great Britain in the not far distant future, notwithstanding the fact that for 21 years foreign governments that borrowed from us during the years of the World War have repudiated their debts and have hurled at us the name "Uncle Shylock," even when that name was belied by the white crosses of Flanders fields, marking the effort that saved democracy, for the moment at least. Let us help Finland, but let us do it wisely; let us not lose our fortunate position; let us not drive the opening wedge; let us stand positively and emphatically for a neutrality that the world will know we actually mean and that we intend to perpetuate and enforce.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in a fight between a gangster and a law-abiding, upright citizen, every right-thinking person reacts in exactly the same way. All of our sympathies are with the victim of lawless violence. In common with the great masses of the American people, I have felt outraged at the wanton and brutal attack of the assassin Government of Russia upon the Republic of Finland. The blood of every decent person in this country or anywhere in the world has boiled at the story of the uncivilized attacks of this communistic horde upon a free and liberty-loving people. Our hearts have all thrilled to the saga of Finnish heroism in resisting this unprovoked and wanton aggression.

When I left the Senate Chamber last Friday afternoon I was somewhat confused in my own mind as to how I would vote on the pending legislation. My sympathies with those who are suffering in Finland had collided with my prior conclusion, and I was almost disposed to support this legislation, which, while it is entitled, in substance, "A bill to increase the capital of the Export-Import Bank," is really legislation to enable additional credit to be extended to the Finnish Republic. It is my custom, when I reach my office, to go through and sign my mail. I usually read every piece of correspondence that comes into my office. It so happened on Friday that I had an unusually heavy mail. A very large proportion of it consisted of letters from my State, from citizens of the United States, appealing to me as one of their representatives in the National Congress to assist them with their pressing problems. Some of the letters were from those who could scarcely write, letters written with pencil on pieces of tablet paper, evidently the tablet paper that the writers' children used in school.

A letter of a few lines said:

> I am sure in need. If I don't get some help some way, I don't know what I will do. There is 10 of us in the family, and we haven't got enough to live on; and if you can help me in any way I will be more than glad.

There are a number of other letters here, of the same tenor and effect, from American citizens who have either been discharged from the relief rolls or have been unable to obtain employment on the W. P. A. Some of the letters were written by other persons with typewriters, referring to those of whom they had personal knowledge who were in dire need. The one I have before me reads as follows:

> Mrs. G. is a widow supporting her aged and widowed mother, 75 years old, who has a serious heart ailment. She is without funds or income of any kind, having disposed of her furniture piece by piece to prevent starvation. Mrs. G. has been brave, and I am appealing to you to help her in her quest for employment.

There were other communications from farmers in my State who had been the victims of the unusual weather conditions which prevailed last year. One wrote that he had two mules, one of which the Farm Security Administration had helped him to purchase; that he had just been notified that the funds of the Farm Security Administration were exhausted; that no loans could be made to him; and that the Farm Security Administration was going to take these two mules away from him.

Another stated that an agency of the Federal Government—the Farm Credit Administration—was preparing to foreclose upon the writer's farm and put it on the block and sell it to the highest bidder before the courthouse door because he, an American citizen, had been victimized by unusual weather conditions and had not made a good crop.

Other letters of the past 2 or 3 days—I do not think there was one in Friday's mail—referred to the fact that the unseasonably cold weather in my State had destroyed the crop of the writers, and that they had turned to agencies of the Federal Government—their Government, if you please—and had been told that the funds of the Farm Security Administration were exhausted, that no loans could be made, and that so many restrictions and so much red tape had been bound around what we commonly call seed loans that they were not able to reach the citizen, though his distress was genuine.

Mr. President, reading those letters caused me to pause. Despite the admiration and respect we all have for the Finnish people because they have paid their obligations up to this time, no Senator would assert on this floor that when the full power of the detestable communistic Government of Russia is brought to bear on Finland, the Finns will be able to resist. No Senator would assert that there is any surety that the money which is proposed to be loaned can be repaid. The history of Finland shows that since the twelfth century the Finns have been under the domination of other powers, down to about the year 1918. It seems that history repeats itself quickly, and that the Finns are again threatened with Russian domination, as abhorrent as it is to all of us who despise bolshevism and communism.

I do not believe that the proposed loans are good credit risks. We have been told that we are faced with a period when it is necessary to economize. In a few days the Senate will have before it the appropriation for the Civilian Conservation Corps and for work relief for the coming year, cut to the bone—yea, to the marrow—by the Bureau of the Budget in the name of economy. There is pending at this very moment in the Senate Committee on Appropriations the farmers' appropriation bill for the coming year, reduced $578,000,000 below the appropriations for the current year for the agricultural activities of the United States. In the name of economy, either at the Bureau of the Budget or in the other branch of the Congress, this appropriation has been reduced 44 percent from the appropriation for the current year for the relief of the down-trodden and hard-pressed agricultural population of the United States.

In the other body of the Congress, when an item was reached providing for an attack on one of the problems that is fundamental in the perpetuation of our institutions of government—I refer to the loans to tenant farmers, to enable them to become home owners—in the name of economy the insignificant sum of $25,000,000 was stricken from the bill, despite the pleas of those who know something about the sufferings of the farm tenants and the farm sharecroppers, and the farm laborers of the United States, and of their desire to own their own homes.

No doubt the people of Finland today are hard pressed in a struggle against unequal odds, but the farm tenants and the sharecroppers of my State have been carrying on with equal heroism against equally great odds, and they are told that the Government, their Government, the Government of their own country, is unable to extend to them loans which would enable them to become home owners, so that they might feel they had a stake in their own Government.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that when he speaks of a loan to Finland he is not entirely accurate. The loan is to be made, it is true, upon the credit of the Finnish Government——

Mr. RUSSELL. What is the difference?

Mr. BROWN. Or some corporation.

Mr. RUSSELL. What is the difference between a loan to Finland and a loan on the credit of the Finnish Government?

Mr. BROWN. The money will go to farmers and manufacturers in the United States, including the State of Georgia, whose principal product is cotton. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in 1938 by far the largest imports into Finland were of cotton, the principal product of the Senator's own State. If a loan is made to Finland—and I assume it will be if we enact the bill—it will mean that more cotton will be taken from the poor farmers in Georgia, of whom the Senator is talking. That money will never leave the United States. It will all stay here, and go into circulation here. What we will turn over to the Finns in return for their credit will be the products of the farms and the factories of the United States.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I decline to yield until I give some consideration to the words of the Senator from Michigan.

I have endeavored to listen carefully to the debate on the pending bill. When the distinguished Senator from Michigan opened his remarks in presenting the bill to the Senate, I understood him to make identically the same statement he has made at this time, with this exception, that in this statement he has brought it down to the cotton farmers in Georgia, whereas in his opening remarks he referred to the cotton farmers of the entire United States.

Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan has been forthright in this matter. He has been willing to stand before the world and say, "Finland, we will lend you this money on your credit, to spend where you choose for what you choose to buy." No one will quarrel with the Senator from Michigan for his views, because he expresses them openly and fairly, but I submit that it does not make any difference in the total measure of relief which will be available for those in distress in this country in the eventual workings of our economic system, whether we give the Finns goods, or whether we give them the money and they buy the goods. It is exactly the same thing. If this money shall be lost through the giving of goods, it will be just as surely lost as though the money were given.

I might further say that if we are to give away cotton goods, let us give it to those in this country who today have not adequate clothing. I have ridden along the highways of my State and seen little children standing by the roadside whose sole piece of clothing was a gunny sack made out of jute, in which fertilizer had been purchased to go on the cotton, and if I were going to give away cotton, after buying it from the cotton farmers of the United States, I would want to give it to some in this country sadly in need of adequate clothing. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWARTZ in the chair). The Chair admonishes the occupants of the galleries that the rules of the Senate prohibit expressions of approval or disapproval on the part of those in the galleries.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I again call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the bill does not contemplate a gift. Insofar as Finland is concerned, we are dealing with the one country which has proven to the United States that it will stand by its word, that it will stand by its bond, and pay its debts. We are assuming that this debt will be paid. Therefore, I think that what the Senator says about giving away our products is beside the point. Every Member of Congress understands the extension of aid will be by way of a loan.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator's assumption that there is to be a loan which will be repaid is one so violent, in view of the actualities in the world today, that I cannot join him in it.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The Senator from Michigan has just told us that we are not to make a loan. I wish to read to the Senate the words which came from the lips of the Senator from Michigan himself. On Friday last, when the Senator was explaining to us the bill providing for aid to American manufacturers, the Senator said that it was a loan. I respectfully call the Senator's attention to his explanation on page 1276 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 9, last Friday, in which explanation the Senator said:

> First. The loan must not be in violation of international law.
> Second. It must not be for arms and munitions as heretofore defined by the President.

In addition to that, in his remarks to the Senate on the bill now before it for consideration, the Senator from Michigan said:

> I think I can answer that question without qualification by saying that the Federal Loan Administrator, Mr. Jones, in his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee, plainly stated that he thought that the Finns were entitled to a credit of at least $10,000,000 more than they now have; and I have not the slightest doubt that he and the President of the United States are in accord in that respect, because the President sent a message to Congress in effect urging that we do this in order that Finland might obtain a loan.

Mr. BROWN and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to say to the Senator that I did not think I was capable of so clearly outlining what the exact situation is as I did, apparently, in the statement which the Senator has read. As I tried to make clear, it is not a case of making a straight loan of cash to the Finnish Government. We only lend to them, as I stated in the remarks which the Senator has read, when the loan aids in the sale of our agricultural and manufactured products, under the restriction that it shall not be in violation of international law, and that it shall not in any sense be an unneutral act.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the Senator from North Carolina misunderstood the Senator from Michigan a moment ago.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am quite sure he did.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator did not say it was not a loan; he said it was not a gift.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was under the impression that the Senator was insisting that this was not a loan.

Mr. BROWN. I thank the Senator for bringing out the point, because I think what he quoted from my remarks last Friday clearly stated the situation as it is.

Mr. REYNOLDS. As a matter of fact, I happened to underline that because of the fact that in the debate on Friday the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] insisted that it was not a loan, that it was merely an advance of credit, and in the argument at that time I was directing inquiry to myself as to whether this was a gift, a loan, or an advance.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, there is no real difference, if the Senator will permit me, between a loan and an advance of credit.

Mr. RUSSELL. Not at all.

Mr. REYNOLDS. None whatsoever.

Mr. BARKLEY. They are the same. If the Senator will permit me, while I am on my feet, I wish to say that this bill is being treated by a number of Senators as if it were a bill strictly for the benefit of Finland. The bill merely does what the President and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Export-Import Bank asked us to do a year ago; that is, to increase the capital stock of the bank a hundred million dollars. Of course, at the time the matter was under consideration last year no war was in prospect, no war was thought of, and I suppose the thing farthest from the minds of all in the Senate was that Finland would be overrun by Russia.

The Senate adopted three-quarters of the request by passing a bill providing for a $75,000,000 increase in the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank to carry out the purposes of the original act; that is to say, to facilitate the exportation of American products. While an increase in the capital stock of the bank of a hundred million dollars is asked for, only one-fifth of that amount could be used for a loan to Finland, because Finland could not get more than $20,000,000 in addition to the $10,000,000 for which credit has already been provided.

I think I ought to say, too, that it does not mean that that money is to come out of the Treasury. The Senator will recall that the President in his Budget message set up an item, or an aggregation of items, amounting to $700,000,000, which might be returned to the Treasury by various corporations, including the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which he said could return to the Treasury $200,000,000 of the $500,000,000 of its capital stock. When the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank is increased it will not be money taken out of the Treasury; it will be money provided by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as and when it is needed, through the sale of its own obligations to the public, through which method it has raised most of the money it has already loaned in the way of loans to industry and for the facilitation of our exports, and only in the case of a loan on the part of the Export-Import Bank beyond its profits would the Treasury be called upon to furnish any of the money.

So the increase in the capital stock would not automatically or necessarily or theoretically make it impossible for the Congress to do exactly what the Senator from Georgia has indicated it is his desire to do, that is, to provide money with which to buy cotton, for instance, to help clothe those who are underclad in the United States. That might come out of the Treasury, or might not, depending on the law Congress may pass. But the point is that the increase in the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank, which in my view is necessary regardless of Finland, regardless of Norway, regardless of Sweden, regardless of China—although they do come into the picture—will not in any way place a burden on the Treasury, and will never take a dollar out of the Treasury, unless it becomes remotely necessary to reimburse the Export-Import Bank for any loss it might sustain.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I had not intended to discuss the niceties of high finance by which the Senator can make it apparent that we can reach into a hat and get $100,000,000 for the purpose of making loans to foreign governments without it being a charge on the Treasury of the United States. But regardless of the fact that we are here taking money out of one pocket of the Government, as represented by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and putting it into another pocket called the Export-Import Bank, to be delivered from those to still another pocket, to send credits to Finland, the fact remains, and all that the average citizen could be expected to know about his Government is that if the money is lost it will be a charge on the Treasury of the United States, and I am sure that with that statement the Senator from Kentucky will agree.

Mr. BARKLEY. That would depend on whether the aggregate losses of the Export-Import Bank on individual loans would exceed the profits. Last year the Export-Import Bank made a profit of a little more than two and one-half million dollars. Of course, in 4 years the profit, if at the same rate, would exceed the loss of a $10,000,000 loan, assuming that the entire $10,000,000 was a loss.

Mr. RUSSELL. I must confess my surprise that my friend the Senator from Kentucky would resort to such specious reasoning when he speaks about the condition of a National Treasury that owes almost $45,000,000,000, and which was compelled to put up at the outset the capital stock for the Export-Import Bank and for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; only for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation put up the capital for the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. BARKLEY. We provided $500,000,000 capital for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which was paid in in cash to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by the Treasury, and although the capital stock of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is only $500,000,000, they have loaned 20 times that much money, because they were permitted to loan at a rate of about 10 to 1 of the amount of their capital stock—probably 20 to 1 in some cases altogether, although not all outstanding at any one time. Now, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, according to Mr. Jones' testimony, can return to the Treasury of the United States $200,000,000 of its original $500,000,000 capital without in any way interfering with its operations either under the $100,000,000 capital or under the $200,000,000 capital as provided in this bill. It is not a specious argument at all, because the public is putting up this money through the purchase of the obligations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It is not coming out of the Treasury, and, as I said a moment ago, it would never come out of the Treasury, none of it, unless the losses of the Export-Import Bank should exceed its profits.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, the distinguished leader of the majority is always most persuasive. I shall not undertake to follow him through all the tortuous course of these various instruments of government that are dealing with the questions of making loans and financing exports. I am delighted to hear that some of them have made a profit. The point I wished to suggest was that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Export-Import Bank would have to earn profits far beyond those mentioned by the Senator from Kentucky, far beyond even those that the most optimistic advocate of this loan can conceive of, to be able to wipe out the public debt which has been incurred as a part of a drive—of which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is a part—to bring about recovery in the United States.

Mr. President, I am delighted to know that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is making profits, and we have all taken great courage from that fact. I read the hearings had in the Committee on Foreign Relations, and was glad to see that the Export-Import Bank had made a small profit last year. But the Senator from Kentucky knows that even though we may keep one set of books for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation showing a profit, and another set of books for the Treasury of the United States showing a debt, that if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or any of its subsidiaries, including the Export-Import Bank, loses any money it will eventually be a loss of assets of the United States Government, which, while they might not come direct from the Treasury, would go to the Treasury to help wipe out the debt, or for other purposes, had they not been lost.

You cannot stand one Government agency on its bottom here and say that because that Government agency has made $2,000,000 or $4,000,000, that the Treasury is not operating at a deficit. We must consider all of the operations of the Government and total both profits and losses of all of its agencies and all expenditures to get a true picture. On the whole, the Government is badly in debt and any loss of money increases the indebtedness.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, of course, the Senator realizes that the forty-four-billion-and-some-odd-million dollars, whatever the amount of the Treasury debt is at this time, is made up of many items, and that if we may assume that the Treasury borrowed all the $500,000,000 to furnish the capital stock for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, that is only a small percentage, about one-eightieth of the total public debt. I do not suppose anyone would contend that the Export-Import Bank could possibly make enough in profits, if it had no losses at all, to make very much of a dent in the total public debt at this time.

The point I am seeking to make is that each one of these institutions stands on its own bottom as a business organization. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is a business organization and it has made profits. The Export-Import Bank is standing on its own responsibility, and it has made profits. In addition to the financial profits it has made, it has facilitated very greatly the exportation of American products, without which they would be piled up now in the warehouses or granaries of the United States as a part of our unsalable surplus.

No one can tell in the course of 10 years whether the net result of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's operations will be a net profit or a loss. The same thing is true of the Export-Import Bank. The same thing is true of any private bank in this country. We cannot over a 10-year period foresee how much profit it will make or whether there may be set up a loss. But taking the record up to date, I think we can reasonably assume, regardless of our sympathy for Finland or any other country, that in all probability no loan will be made to any of them or for the benefit of any of them without reasonable assurance that the loan will be paid.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, if I could share the confidence of the Senator from Kentucky that if this loan were made to Finland it can be collected, I would not interpose any special objection to this bill.

I had not intended to discuss the intricacies of the operations of the various departments of government with respect to the source from which their funds were derived. We all know that each is part of the Government of the United States, and whether you have 1 agency or 20 agencies, you must have a total somewhere of your assets and your liabilities. When our assets increase our liabilities decrease.

I made the statement earlier in my remarks that, in my judgment, this loan to Finland did not have any unusually good chance of being a collectible loan. My opposition to this measure is based upon the fact that we are here appropriating funds to loan to Finland and perhaps to other countries, for no man knows when the tides of war will rise in Europe and engulf some other small nation there which is entitled to our respect and admiration. I will not vote for any doubtful foreign-loan proposal when we are told here in the Congress of the United States that conditions are such that we cannot lend money to American tenant farmers to enable them to purchase homes, that we cannot lend money to tenant farmers with which to buy the seeds or tools with which to make a crop.

Speaking about a loan to Finland being collectible, and the fact that Finland has paid its loans to date, I might point out that for the 2 or 3 years we have made loans under the farm-tenant purchase program that more than 100 percent of the maturities have been paid. These tenant farmers have so appreciated the interest shown by the Government in their efforts to become home owners that they have anticipated their maturities and have paid back more than 100 percent of the total they had agree to pay on their loans. The security behind those loans is a security which is tangible to my eyes—the farm lands in the United States and the faith and credit of American citizens who are striving to go ahead.

Mr. President, I shall not undertake to discuss the questions of international law that might be involved in this loan. I have had no occasion to examine the precedents involved, as I am not a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. I do know something of our experience with loans in the last war, and it was not very pleasant. I would dislike to see us set a precedent which is likely to lead to loans to other belligerents. The demand will come when the war starts in earnest. A policy of loans to belligerent nations, whether there has been a formal declaration of war or not, is fraught with danger to the peace and economy of the United States.

I do not intend to discuss the niceties of legislative drafting, which have transformed a bill which was introduced as direct authority for a loan to Finland into one to increase the capital of the Export-Import Bank. Both bills have a similar purpose. I do not know that Mr. Jones said so in express terms, but I obtained the very definite impression from his testimony before the committees of the Senate that he would consider the passage of this bill as a legislative mandate to make additional loans to Finland. He did not say so in express terms, but I obtained that impression from the general tenor of his statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Jones originally stated before the Banking and Currency Committee, whose hearings were not taken down and are not a matter of record, that without additional legislation of some kind he would not feel authorized to go beyond the $10,000,000 already provided for credit to the corporation through which the loan is to be made and the American products are to be exported. The bill in its present form furnishes the additional legislation which Mr. Jones would regard as authority for him to make an additional loan; but throughout his testimony before the Banking and Currency Committee and also before the Foreign Relations Committee he said that the making of such a loan would depend upon conditions which might exist at the time Finland should apply for the loan. I do not recall his having suggested or intimated that he would regard this bill as a mandate for him to make the loan, regardless of the conditions which might exist.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not mean without regard to conditions or security. Perhaps I should have used the expression that he would consider the bill as legislative approval to increase the authorizations for loans.

Mr. BARKLEY. Provided the conditions met the requirements at the time the loan was made or applied for, which would justify him or those in charge of the bank in making the loan with reasonable assurance that it would be repaid.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. In view of the last remark of the Senator from Georgia with reference to his interpretation of the testimony of Mr. Jones, and particularly in view of the acquaintance we all have with Mr. Jones and the care with which he acts in the matter of making loans from funds of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, I should like to ask the Senator to permit me to read at this point from page 21 of the testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee. Mr. Jones was testifying:

> Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Jones, you have said there is not necessarily any increased credit for Finland in this bill, have you not?
> Mr. JONES. I have.
> Senator VANDENBERG. You said that if there are increased credits, it will depend upon subsequent circumstances. That was your language.
> Mr. JONES. No.
> Senator VANDENBERG. Yes; you said "circumstances." I wrote it down so that I might ask you what were the circumstances.
> Mr. JONES. I did not use the word "subsequent." I said circumstances at the time.
> Senator VANDENBERG. That is correct. What circumstances would govern an additional loan to Finland?
> Mr. JONES. Everything that might affect the ability of Finland to repay the loan.
> Senator VANDENBERG. That would be the only thing you would consider?
> Mr. JONES. That would be the only thing I would consider.
> Senator VANDENBERG. If you thought you were not going to get the money back, you would not make the loan?
> Mr. JONES. I would not.
> Senator VANDENBERG. Regardless of any other thing?
> Mr. JONES. I would not.

In the light of the experience we have had with Mr. Jones and his care in the making of loans, how can the Senator say that Mr. Jones would consider the proposed legislation as a mandate and would make a loan contrary to the testimony which he gave?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I stated that perhaps the word "mandate" was not properly descriptive, but I did obtain the very definite impression from my reading of the testimony that Mr. Jones would not make any further loans to Finland unless this bill were enacted into law. Did not the Senator from Washington obtain the same impression?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. It is true that he would not make any further loans. He has made commitments in excess of the $100,000,000. He would be limited upon that basis, so he could not make any more loans. However, I listened to the testimony of Mr. Jones all the time he was before the committee; and repeatedly when he was brought back to the exact question of what the requirements would be in reference to a loan he insisted that he would make no loan unless he had a reasonable belief that it would be repaid, and that he would take into consideration all the circumstances, including the circumstances that the Finnish Government might be wiped out and be unable to repay because of that fact. I could not construe Mr. Jones' testimony, as does the Senator, to mean that he would be any less careful in making the proposed loan than he has been in connection with applications from the various States, which have been submitted to the agency in the belief that they were perfectly good applications, only to have Jesse Jones say, "No; I cannot make that loan, because it will not be repaid."

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a brief statement?

Mr. RUSSELL. I shall be glad to yield in a moment.

Mr. President, I have as high respect and regard for Mr. Jesse Jones as has any Member of this body. He has done a perfectly wonderful job in handling the lending agencies which have been under his control and direction. However, Mr. President, I do not conceive that we should legislate here on the assumption that this man or that man will forever be in control of the lending agencies of the United States. Who knows where Mr. Jones may be tomorrow? Who knows what pressure might be brought upon Mr. Jones from other sources to make loans which his better judgment told him were not safe loans? I consider that I have some small responsibility in this matter as a Senator. This legislation was brought out as a vehicle to provide a direct loan of $60,000,000 to Finland for any purpose. I think I should form an opinion in my own mind as to whether or not a loan to Finland is a good loan. Other Senators may think loans to Finland are good. Mr. Jones might think that loans to Finland are based upon good security. I hope others are right and that I am wrong. However, my judgment tells me that a loan to Finland at the present time is not a loan with as good security as that which is being sought by American citizens today. I may be narrow in my thinking, but I do not propose to vote for any foreign loan of doubtful nature. When I see unanswered the supplications of American citizens who have good collateral for loans, Americans who are living today in the very lowest stratum of our social structure, and who have not adequate food and clothing or means with which to carry on their farming operations or the work through which they earn their daily bread, I do not propose to vote for any loans of a doubtful nature as long as such conditions exist in this country.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I should think the Senator would be pleased to see the continuance of a governmental institution such as the Export-Import Bank or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, because they are agencies of the Government which have operated profitably.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Michigan cannot put me in the position of attacking the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The Senator is endeavoring to put words in my mouth, and to attribute to me a thought which I have never entertained.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator has announced that he opposes the enlargement of the capital funds of the Export-Import Bank, which, like the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, has been well managed, not only by Mr. Jones, but by the other trustees.

In this connection I should like to call attention to the exact figures. The majority leader has given the figures for the year 1939. The net profit of the Export-Import Bank up to January 31, 1940, after all expenses, including losses, is the sum of $5,074,754. It seems to me that is a pretty good showing. Regardless of loans to Finland, or to China, or to any other foreign country, I think that when we have a Government institution which is aiding the farmer and industry, as this one is doing, and showing a profit to the Treasury of $5,000,000 over approximately a 5-year period, that is the kind of Government institution which we ought to encourage and continue.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, my position in the matter is not as indicated by the Senator from Michigan. I have not opposed either the Export-Import Bank or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I have been in hearty accord with the operations of the Export-Import Bank, up until the war broke out in Europe. I still favor its negotiations with nations not at war or likely to be involved in war. I am endeavoring to maintain its splendid reputation by preventing it from making loans of doubtful value, which might wipe out the profits which have heretofore accrued. I shall not approve of any loan that is of doubtful value so long as we have so many unsolved internal problems, and large numbers of our own people who are good credit risks, but unable to obtain loans from the same Treasury which will be compelled to replenish any losses incurred in foreign loans.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the pending bill, I desire briefly to state my position.

I shall vote against the bill providing for loans through the Export-Import Bank to Finland or any other country engaged in war.

I am casting this vote not because of any lack of sympathy with the Finns in the courageous and glorious fight they are making against the unprovoked and brutal attack by Soviet Russia. I am strong for Finland, but I am voting against the bill because I sincerely believe that, if enacted, it will set the pattern for similar action later with respect to other nations.

Much as I sympathize with the plight of Finland and the Finnish people, much as I want to see them victorious, I myself feel compelled to oppose war loans to the gallant people of Finland because I do not want this Nation to engage in the business of war.

Nor do I want to take a step which I sincerely believe will finally lead to our own involvement in the general European war, which most emphatically is not our war. We have no business meddling in foreign wars. We have plenty of trouble at home to look after.

This bill really proposes that our Government shall borrow more money to make additional loans to other governments, through increasing the authorization for loans by the Export-Import Bank by another $100,000,000. This Government is continually borrowing; it is now facing 10 years of deficit spending. We are trying to economize, to cut down our governmental spending of borrowed money for our own people, millions of whom are in need of help. Now comes a proposal to borrow and lend an additional $100,000,000 to foreign governments. I am against it.

Mr. President, I think we have a duty to our own people, to our own unemployed, to our own distressed farmers, and to other sufferers from hard times in the United States, which is of even greater importance than rushing to the aid of nations across the ocean, who will continue to have their wars generation after generation, as they have had them for thousands of years past.

Mr. President, I am for strict neutrality as to all foreign wars, and shall continue to maintain that position. I think the Government of the United States should be striving to maintain strict neutrality instead of trying to figure out ways of becoming unneutral while maintaining the mask of official neutrality.

I shall vote "no" on the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement debate from this time on is limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the limited time at my disposal precludes a proper survey of the pending measure, together with its implications. The Communist regime, while having for its object the destruction of all bourgeois governments and the establishment of a Communist system throughout the world, has masqueraded as a supporter of peace, but it has never lost sight of the philosophy of Lenin and the purpose to overthrow all democratic institutions, and, indeed, all governments throughout the world. It has, in its subtle way, attempted to convince the people that it sought only the welfare of all peoples, but it has never disavowed its purpose to bring all peoples and all nations under Communist control. The Bolshevik government has been the enemy of liberty, justice, and democracy; it has superimposed upon the people of Russia an oppressive dictatorship and a system of regimentation which denies individual liberty, freedom of expression, and every form of independence. The Bolshevik regime is now revealing its hatred of democracy and of independent governments by attacking in a savage and brutal way a free and independent people, who have builded a fine civilization. The Bolshevik regime will not hesitate to strike any community or any government when it regards the moment propitious to the attainment of its purpose. It may speak words of peace and friendship while contemplating assaults upon communities and governments and the overthrow of democratic institutions. The brutal attack upon Finland is a manifestation of the character and purpose of Communist Russia. It sends its agents throughout the world to secretly disseminate the poison of communism and to undermine the foundations of law and order upon which democratic governments rest.

It has formed an illicit relation with Hitlerism in order to weaken, if not destroy, European nations, expecting, however, in the wreckage which might follow, communism would be pervasive in all of the conquered lands. Communism seeks to destroy, not to build; to promote war and not peace; to destroy religion and moral and spiritual values, and to superimpose in their stead a gross materialistic, Godless regime.

I fear that some peoples are not aroused to the menace of communism and to the serious consequences which would follow the destruction of Finland by the Communist Government. Communistic Russia is not fighting Finland alone; it is fighting all democratic and Christian nations, and all forces that make for world peace, unity, liberty, and justice. If Finland shall be destroyed, Stalin and Hitler will continue their brutal course seeking the destruction of the Scandinavian states. If Finland is destroyed and Sweden and Norway are brought under the control of Russia or Germany, or both, then Denmark, Holland, and Belgium will feel the heavy hand of this destructive foe.

Mr. Walter Lippmann, in an article appearing in the Washington Post of December 16, 1939, indicates the menace to democratic nations if the Bolshevik Government shall triumph in her attack upon Finland. He refers to the aid which might or should be given to Finland, and states:

> For a study of the political map shows that supplies can be delivered to Finland only by passing through Norway and Sweden or across Germany. The crucial question, therefore, is whether Hitler will permit Sweden, which is Finland's next neighbor, to become the base for the delivery of military supplies, drawn from Great Britain, France, Italy, and the United States. Sweden is within the orbit of the military power of Nazi Germany. If Hitler were not a partner of Stalin's, Finland would never have been attacked. If Hitler were not seeking to make Stalin his military ally, there would be no difficulty whatever about delivering arms to the Finns. But because nazi-ism and bolshevism are allies, Sweden is intimidated. The Swedes do not dare to go fully to the help of the Finns for fear of being attacked in the rear by Hitler.
> The fact of the matter is that no neutral state in Europe is safe if it is within the orbit of Hitler's military power. Only those neutrals are secure which, like Ireland, Portugal, and Spain, are behind the sheltering wall of the Franco-British power. Only those neutrals are sure to be defended which, like Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Greece, and Turkey, are within the effective reach of the Franco-British power. This is the fundamental fact out of which arise the issues of the war.

In my opinion the bill before us does not adequately meet the views of the American people. This great democratic Nation is profoundly interested in the cause of democracy everywhere. In its discharge of its duty as a neutral it is not forbidden to sympathize with the downtrodden and oppressed, and with nations struggling for their liberty against brutal aggressions. We are justified in adopting policies and measures to aid the valiant and heroic people who are fighting for the preservation of their country. In rendering aid such as this bill provides or to make loans and grants to Finland, we are not violating international law. Finland is not a belligerent within the meaning and intent of our present neutral legislation, and it is the measured opinion of experts in international law and in jurisprudence that in extending credit to Finland we would not contravene any international obligations resting upon us. The bill before us, as I have indicated, does not adequately meet the situation nor does it fully express the views of the American people. They are practically unanimous in the view that the danger to democracy and civilization by the assault upon Finland is so great that this Nation as well as other democratic nations should give prompt aid—financial and otherwise—to the brave and valiant Finns who are, as has so often been said, standing at Thermopylae, holding back oriental hordes, the enemies of democratic nations and the principles of justice and liberty.

In all democratic countries there is a rising tide of indignation against Stalin's brutal and indeed cowardly attack upon a brave, progressive, and Christian people. They see in this attack upon Finland evidence of the implacable purpose of the Communist Government to destroy independent nations and to bring peoples of the world under its control.

I have referred to the fact that there is universal sympathy for Finland among all democratic peoples. I am reminded that the people of Hungary are greatly concerned over the Communist assault upon Finland, and in a recent circular letter, which was issued by the Bench of Bishops of the Hungarian Lutheran Church on December 14, 1939, reference was made to the "Russian giant" and its efforts to destroy the Finnish nation. I quote from the circular referred to, as follows:

> The joy of advent, the season of preparation for the birth of Jesus Christ, has been disturbed by the appalling events taking place in the far north. The "Russian giant," ironclad from head to foot, has set forth to destroy one of the finest and bravest peoples, the little Finnish nation. With sledge hammer raised to strike, the giant is preparing to deal a blow under which churches, cultural institutions, and family altars will collapse in ruins. The Finnish nation holds the standard of the Gospel aloft and puts its trust in the mercy of God made manifest therein. The civilized nations of the world, aghast and filled with righteous indignation, watch the stage where the curtain threatens to rise on a historical tragedy in which godless Soviet Russia's 185,000,000 inhabitants are preparing to trample to death the God-fearing Finnish nation of three and a half million souls.

If time permitted, I would read into the RECORD statements by Stalin and Bolshevik leaders concerning the world program of the Communist government. Orders have been given by Stalin and Bolshevik leaders as to the methods to be pursued by Communists in this and other lands with the view of undermining existing governments and of sowing seeds of communism. The philosophy of bolshevism does not rest alone upon Karl Marx, but it finds some roots in the Russian character. Before the rise of bolshevism the Russian people possessed grandiose views as to the future and ambition of Russia. Imperialistic ambitions envisioned an empire from the Carpathians to the Pacific Ocean; but the Bolsheviks are not satisfied with an empire so extensive—they seek world domination, and this they hope to accomplish by dividing nations and groups in order that there may be a fertile field for communism and for communistic control. It has been said that the "red" empire of today has followed the imperialistic views of the Czars and it now extends from the Carpathians to the Pacific Ocean; and it is thrusting its hand into central Europe, thus threatening the overthrow of western civilization as a whole.

Symptomatic of the present condition of European civilization is the confidence and indeed the audacity with which the Communists now boldly proclaim their views. I read from the current issue, November 18, of the Comintern Journal, World News and Views, as follows:

> "A specter is haunting Europe—the specter of communism," wrote Marx and Engels in 1848. "All the powers of old Europe have entered into a Holy Alliance to exorcise this specter; Pope and Tsar, Metternich and Guizot, French radicals and German police spies."

Communism, no longer a specter but clothed in Soviet flesh and blood, is again haunting Europe in this period of the second imperialist World War. Its frontiers were advanced in eastern Europe within 3 weeks of the war breaking out; not a step is taken by the warring imperialist powers without having to take into account the power of the Soviet Union and the revolutionary spirit of the international working class.

Senators will perceive the spirit and ambition of Communist Russia in the declaration that communism is "no longer a specter but clothed in Soviet flesh and blood." It boasts of its triumph in conquering a large part of Poland within a limited period; and it declares that the power of the Soviet Union must be taken into account in all international affairs.

In the time of the czars Moscow was to be the third and last Rome, but today Moscow is to be a "red" capital of the "red" Soviet empire. The boundary of the Soviet Union has swiftly moved forward more than 250 miles, until now it overlooks Europe's western wall, the Carpathians.

No one familiar with Russia, with the teachings and views of the Bolsheviks, can doubt the unalterable and fixed purpose of Russia to weaken all nations, and to ultimately destroy them so that upon their ruins the communistic rule may be imposed.

When I had the floor a few days ago I referred to a visit I paid to Russia, and to the views expressed to me by Bolshevik leaders, that the mission of the communistic regime was to destroy the capitalistic system, and religion, and democratic governments.

Mr. President, Finland has not declared war upon any country, and Soviet Russia has not declared war upon Finland, although she is waging a brutal and murderous campaign for the destruction of the Finnish Government, if not the annihilation of the Finnish people. Finland is a civilized nation. She is in the position of a member—a highly respected member—of the family of nations, whose home has suddenly and wantonly been invaded by a brutal criminal. Her children have been assassinated by bombs from marauding airplanes; her modest property has been overrun by an organized band of international revolutionaries; and her churches, shrines, and fireplaces have been stained by the blood of heroic sons who preferred to die in their defense rather than submit to the cynical and criminal ultimatum of the aggressor.

Let us therefore hear no more of the protest that any aid to Finland of a practical and defensive nature would be a violation either of international law or of neutrality. If international law should even prevent a strong man from coming to the assistance of an innocent sufferer who is defending that same law, it seems to me it should be consigned to the realm of forgotten issues. If neutrality means that Soviet Russia can commit the unprovoked and brutal aggression of which it is now guilty and then say to the United States, "You shall cooperate in my iniquity by refusing to exercise your sovereign right to deal with one of your friends," then, I say, the neutrality law should be modified to meet the humane, progressive, and Christian views which ought to prevail in a civilized world.

In many European countries the attack upon Finland is regarded as a warning to all democratic nations. There is a growing conviction that Finland is defending not alone her own people and her own borders, but the cause of democracy, liberty, and justice in every part of the world. I am convinced that the unprovoked attack of Soviet Russia on Finland is a blow at the very heart of every ideal maintained and cherished by the American people. In Finland there existed no substantial minority, appealing to another nation to come to their assistance, as Hitler was able to allege in the case of Sudeten Germans of Czechoslovakia. Here was no Polish Corridor, cutting a part of Germany away from the motherland. Here was no Treaty of Versailles, giving rise to accusations of injustices and impossible conditions imposed by victorious Allies. None of the pretexts which existed in the German case can be found to bolster up or extenuate the unwarranted and fantastic claims of Moscow against the peaceful, progressive, and cultured people of Finland.

The attack, then, is not leveled against a given government, but at liberty itself, at decency itself, and at the very heart of international law. We on this continent who enjoy freedom unassailed and live under the shadow of a Bill of Rights which guarantees every individual against every usurpation of tyranny are liable, at times, to grow callous and indifferent to the destiny of liberty elsewhere. But justice is an indivisible attribute descending from Divinity; and when it is assailed and wounded in any part of the world, it is menaced and endangered in every part of the world. If Finland falls, then the Scandinavian nations will next come under the shadow of the outstretched hand of bolshevism, which will then be advanced hundreds of miles nearer western civilization. And let it never be forgotten that every mile of advance is one mile reduced in our own security and immunity from danger. What is at stake is not a narrow strip of land lying far away in those Arctic wastes but that intangible and precious thing in defense of which American blood has been poured out from Lexington and Bunker Hill to the last American soldier who fell in the World War. Let me remind the Senate that the present invader of Finland has more than once included the United States of America in its eventual program.

Mr. President, I am not now arguing for any involvement of the United States in the European conflict as it is being waged on the western front. In fact, I believe that America's best contribution to world peace and restored sanity will come from her ability to face the uncertain future, strong, alert, and unweakened by the exhaustion that would be consequent on actual warfare. But this determination, which is widespread among our people, should not blind us to the vital issue now being resolved on the eastern front. There, a colossus, devoid of any of those legal or moral controls which characterize an upright government, has sought to advance its atheism, its tyranny, and its revolutionary objectives at a moment when the rest of the world was engaged in an absorbing struggle in the West.

Aid to Finland therefore should be considered on its own merits and as involving no dangerous precedent with respect to the belligerents of western Europe. What is attacked in Finland is international law, basic justice, and Christianity itself. Every ideal and every canon of international relations and international conduct has been flouted and contemptuously ignored by the Soviet Government. Consequently, the usual considerations arising from international good manners and legal obligations have been forfeited by the aggressor in this case. It is the very height of cynicism for the aggressor to make appeal to the protection of international law and the neutrality psychology, while, at the same moment, he is utilizing every device of modern warfare to destroy international law, international justice, and human decency.

Financial aid to Finland in a form that will enable them to repel this attack leveled at international law is, consequently, no violation of international law, but rather a support of and a vindication of international law.

The Government of the United States in the past has adhered to many international conventions, such as the Kellogg Pact, designed to remove from humankind the horrors of warfare. Finland also has adhered to the principles embodied in that pact. Assisting Finland to uphold her word of honor is neither violation of international law nor of neutrality, but is a practical extension of the intent and purposes of the Kellogg Pact. No government can justly complain if the United States decides to render aid and assistance to another government which is heroically striving to maintain the spirit and letter of the international peace to which this Government is traditionally committed.

I have heard with some surprise the various arguments against financial aid to Finland, particularly those which counsel caution and tender treatment of Soviet Russia. The record of that Government, in its attempts to overthrow every other peaceful government through the Third International, which it organized and protected, has canceled out the ordinary considerations which would prevail in the case of other treaty-respecting powers. A government which has not only violated its treaty obligations but seeks to crush a government which does respect law has no further claim on such a tender attitude as has been adopted in certain quarters in the United States if not elsewhere.

That was the judgment passed on Soviet Russia by the League of Nations in its recent session, when it expelled Soviet Russia as an international criminal, and urged every member of the League to throw its weight to the defense of the treaty-keeping power now suffering from the treaty-breaking power. That such defense of international law is no violation of law, of prudence, or of decency, is the official attitude of the governments constituting the League of Nations.

Practical assistance to Finland, therefore, is practical support of the traditional policy of the United States respecting the pacific settlement of international disputes. Millions upon millions of money have been expended in this country, and hundreds upon hundreds of organizations have pledged themselves to the extension of international peace through international law. Would it not be a triumph of the forces of illegality for all such instrumentalities to retreat and remain dumb when a practical case comes before the world? This acid test is the light in which this problem should be examined.

Finland, in her negotiations last autumn, showed herself ready and perfectly willing to submit her case to the tribunal of impartial adjudication. She made every concession to Moscow that was consonant with her national existence. Her offers were all spurned and contemptuously rejected. When invaded, she interposed her own body against the tyranny of injustice. Once again, within the past few days, she has offered the Soviet Government a pacific settlement of all outstanding disputes. The only answer she has received has been from the skies, in the form of a murderous bombardment which has killed hundreds upon hundreds of innocent men, women, and children. To answer her request for a defense loan which will enable her to obtain the means for upholding international law against this most outrageous violation of international justice is neither a breach of neutrality nor a step toward involvement in a European war.

As a sovereign state, at war with no one and at peace with us, Finland has suggested that she obtain a loan. She has scrupulously paid every preceding debt, and we have every reason to believe she will pay this one. She asks no dispatch of American troops to Europe, no hostile demonstration against the Soviet Government. I, for my part, do not see how we can decently refuse this exercise of our own unthreatened sovereignty in support of the invaded sovereignty of law. No case in modern history shows more merit or greater emergency.

That this is the growing opinion of the great masses of the American people is becoming increasingly clear from many popular reactions. Thus I have learned from those who have exerted themselves to obtain relief funds for Finland that many persons, deeply sympathetic with the Finns, are refusing to contribute to the humanitarian organizations because a sense of reality makes them prefer to contribute arms and ammunition. These typical Americans are the last to wish to have America involved in a foreign war, but they are the first to recognize the things that lead to growing injustice and growing brutality. In consequence of this popular reaction, a new organization has recently been founded in New York to receive from the people contributions which may be used for the purchase of weapons of defense, not of aggression.

The Congress may well take note of this widespread reaction throughout the rank and file of our people by approving a loan which will aid Finland in her fight for existence and for the cause of liberty and justice in all the world.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I am unwilling to have this matter disposed of without making a matter of record the conclusions I have reached concerning the proposed legislation.

Mr. President, this bill is offensive to me in its confusion of issues. It presents to us a question of foreign policy and it also requires of us that we vote upon questions of domestic policy and domestic principle.

The bill proposes a vast increase in the funds of the Export-Import Bank. It raises the question whether there shall be a limitation upon the amount hereafter loaned to any country. It presents the issue of whether loans to a foreign country, the amounts, terms, and conditions thereof shall be in the discretion of an administrative branch of the Government.

Mr. President, I am reluctant in the extreme to increase the loaning powers of this bank at this time. The testimony is that the bank has already made loans to and upon the credit of 56 nations scattered over the earth. I am hostile to enlarging at this time the ability of the bank to make loans of the same character to the nations of the world. I am wholly opposed to lodging in an administrative agency of the Government the power so to employ the funds of our people.

I wish this were a bill patterned after its original text, authorizing a direct loan to Finland, without limitations or restrictions upon the use thereof. If the bill were so framed, we would know what we were doing, and the world would know. That certainty is wholly lacking in the amended bill.

Mr. President, I must accept the features which I criticize if I am to vote aid of any sort or of any degree to Finland.

In the course of the discussion, beyond the question of basic policy, two principal objections have been urged against the Finnish loan in the existing circumstances. It is insisted that such a loan would be a violation of neutrality. I am not impressed by that contention. The rule is universally recognized that one nation may aid another nation not at war by loans or otherwise, and our country has asserted the right of a nation to lend even to a belligerent for the purchase of food supplies and of raw materials.

Mr. President, may we lend to Finland for unrestricted purposes, as the bill in its original form proposed? The answer to be given depends upon whether Finland is a belligerent or not. Is Finland in fact and law a belligerent at war with Russia? It is certain that neither the President of the United States nor the Congress has found a state of war to exist involving the security of this country as contemplated in appropriate circumstances by the 1939 Neutrality Act. It is also true that the President has not, independently of the 1939 Neutrality Act but within the sweep of Executive powers, declared Finland to be at war and this Nation to be a neutral in that war.

I ask, If neither the Congress nor the Executive has declared Finland to be at war; if we may continue to ship to her implements of war and all other products of America; if for purposes of trade and commerce we may continue to regard her as a neutral nation, why must we regard her as a belligerent when the question of a loan to her is under consideration? What basis in reason can there be for holding Finland to be a neutral on the one hand and, on the other, hold her to be a belligerent nation?

What other authority than our own attitude is there for the contention that she is not de jure at war? Russia has formally and officially declared that she is not at war with Finland, and Finland in turn has assured our Government that she is not at war; and no neutral nation in all the world has recognized a state of war to exist between these two countries.

When both parties to the alleged state of belligerency declare that they are not at war we have the undoubted right, whether we believe the truth to be as they say or not, to accept their denial of war and to adjust our conduct to the elected status of the two nations. We can, without justified complaint from either and with proper regard for international law, regard and deal with each as a nonbelligerent, as each declares itself to be, and we shall not be breaching our neutrality in conforming our relationship and our acts to the legal status asserted to exist by the powers directly involved.

Mr. President, if we may lend for unrestricted purposes, as I believe we may, we may certainly lend as is now proposed without violation of our neutral obligations.

It has been suggested and urged also that to make a loan to Finland would violate our Constitution. I do not agree with this view. It is true that the Constitution contains no express authority for such action; but I do not overlook the fact that money has been loaned by our Government to persons, to corporations, and to foreign nations for the stimulation of our export and import trade. There is no express constitutional sanction therefor, but the right has not been challenged. Much greater doubt exists in my mind as to our authority in this respect than as to our right to lend to aid Finland in her present circumstances.

The Constitution does confer upon Congress the power to levy taxes for the common defense, and by necessary implication to spend the money so raised in any way which makes contribution to that defense. If we believe that the overrunning of Finland by communistic hordes threatens our fundamental concepts of government and of man's rights, if we believe that invasion of Finland puts in jeopardy our institutions and the perpetuity of those principles which are the distinguishing and the sustaining force of the Republic, then the question of our right to act by a loan or otherwise is affirmatively answered.

In my view, Finland's struggle against barbarous, cruel, and despotic power will be the subject of heroic stories told to generations yet unborn. Finland is writing one of the great epics of history. I would have our country, by loan or by gift, aid her, for in so doing we shall be making cause with civilization, with the freedom of mankind, and we shall be making contribution to the defense and the welfare of these United States.

Mr. President, I shall vote for the pending bill.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT CODE RELATING TO MURDER

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWARTZ in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 186) to amend section 798 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia relating to murder in the first degree.

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House; ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. KING, Mr. VAN NUYS, and Mr. NORRIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

LOANS TO FINLAND

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3069) to provide for certain loans to the Republic of Finland by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, there are a few comments I wish to make on the proposed legislation. I feel somewhat compelled to do so by reason of the fact that, as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I voted to report the bill now pending, and further consideration of the measure and of the circumstances has led me to a conclusion somewhat different from that I entertained during the consideration of the measure in the committee.

The Johnson Act of April 1934 prohibits, under a penalty of not more than 5 years in the penitentiary and a $10,000 fine, the purchase or sale by any citizen of the United States of bonds or securities of any foreign government which is in default in the payment of any obligation due to our Government.

No bar was placed by the Johnson Act against a citizen of the United States buying or selling obligations of a foreign government. South American nations, I think, with perhaps a single exception, are in default upon bonds and obligations due to citizens of the United States aggregating some $3,000,000,000. We make no prohibition against the United States making loans to a country which is in default to our citizens, though we forbid the making of loans to a nation which is in default on its obligations to our Government. In other words, we place the obligations due to our Government upon a different plane from the obligations due to our citizens.

It seems to me that we should, if we can, reconcile these things, and apparently the only reconciliation is that one set of obligations relate to Europe and the other to South America. I think we should harmonize them. I think that if we are to stop dealing with a European country which is in default, we should stop making loans to a South American government which gives no more regard to its obligations.

The Neutrality Act was passed to preserve our neutrality in wars between foreign states and "to avoid involvement therein." We had two purposes in the passage of the Neutrality Act. We wished to avoid any contact which might result in conflict with any warring nation lest such nation should become hostile to us and involve us in war. Our other object was to prevent citizens of the United States becoming interested in a foreign war through the making of loans to a foreign nation, or the extension of credit. We wanted to prevent arousing the emotions of our people. These two things were involved in the Neutrality Act. We forbade citizens of the United States exercising rights long recognized under international law, in order to accomplish the preservation of our neutrality in fact, and the prevention of any possibility of war.

These are some of the offenses we specified which would lead to the imposition of the penalty provided:

First, if a citizen sells or delivers any materials to a belligerent except upon a strict cash-and-carry basis.

Second, if he or his ship enters a combat zone as defined by the President.

Third, if he travels on any vessel of a belligerent.

Fourth, if any American ship arms itself.

Fifth, if a citizen purchases, sells, or exchanges obligations of a belligerent issued after the date of the proclamation of the President.

Sixth, if he extends credit to such belligerent or its representatives.

Seventh, if he solicits any contribution on behalf of a belligerent or one of its agencies, except for medicinal assistance, food, or clothing.

As I see the situation, if nations are at war in fact, will they any less resent aid and assistance given to their enemies even though the President has not issued a declaration that they are at war? Will the citizens of the United States be less inspired to take a partisan interest in a war if they make loans and extend credits to a belligerent, when no war has been found to exist by the President, than if war were declared to exist?

It seems to me that if we are to carry out the main purpose of the Neutrality Act, which is to keep our country out of war, we cannot make a sound distinction between two nations which are in war according to the finding of the President, and two nations which are at war in fact.

What are the facts? There is one war in Europe with Germany on one side, and England and France on the other. There are now waging two other wars. The war between England and France and Germany has been recognized by the President. The war between Finland and Russia, and the war between Japan and China are two unrecognized wars in which a hundred times more men have been killed and more property has been destroyed than in the conflict between the nations which are technically at war.

It seems to me we were very unwise in not following the spirit rather than the letter of our neutrality law. It seems to me that the purpose of the Neutrality Act—to keep the United States out of war—would be better served if we as a nation recognized the existence of actual war. If our Neutrality Act is sound, let us apply the same plan to actual existing war, even though it is not proclaimed by the President. In the extraordinary session we were obviously unwilling to invite the hostility of Germany. We heard much about submarines, and sabotage, and things that might happen if we violated certain rules of neutrality.

Do we seek the enmity of Japan and of Russia? Why should we not mind our own business in February as well as in September?

Mr. President, I am interested in my country. I am interested in its welfare. Technically we, as individuals, can extend aid to Finland and to China, as was pointed out by the very able Senator from Georgia, who would adorn either of the two highest places in our public service. There may be exceptions, but the generally accepted principle is that a nation may not lend money to a belligerent. It is contrary to the general principle of international law. By the Neutrality Act we have prevented our citizens from lending money to a belligerent, but we are now proceeding with a plan whereby the Government may lend money to a belligerent.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think the Senator is correctly quoting the Senator from Georgia when he implies that it is the generally accepted rule of international law that it is unlawful to loan money to a belligerent.

Mr. ADAMS. I said for a nation to lend money to a belligerent nation.

Mr. BROWN. Yes. I do not think the Senator from Georgia said that.

Mr. ADAMS. Then I will exonerate the Senator from Georgia, and say that that is the statement of Moore in his work on international law.

Mr. BROWN. I wish to read what the Senator from Georgia said——

Mr. ADAMS. I am speaking under a limitation of time.

Mr. BROWN. Then, I will not ask the Senator from Colorado to yield. I had forgotten about the time limit. However, I simply call attention to the fact that the Senator from Georgia said that this bill does not, in his opinion, contravene international law.

Mr. ADAMS. In my judgment, we cannot evade international law through the use of corporations of this country, and corporations of China, or corporations of Finland. The loans we propose to make are government loans to governments, and my understanding of international law is that we may not make loans to a belligerent. Now we are dealing with belligerents, not declared to be such by the President, but belligerents in fact. International law antedates the Presidential proclamation under our Neutrality Act and renders unneutral the lending of money by one nation to belligerents.

Again, Senators, I think from our standpoint that war in fact is the thing for us to keep in mind. I think we should not regard merely the technical situation. We are all impressed by Finland and its brave defense of its rights, but no less urgent calls for help came from Ethiopia, which we did not answer; came from Poland, which we did not answer; came from Czechoslovakia, which we did not answer. We suddenly take up a just cause. But if the United States is to become a knight-errant, if it is to become a Don Quixote in the international field, let us count the cost and regard the consequences.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an interruption dealing with the question under consideration?

Mr. ADAMS. If the Senator will have regard for the fact that I am trying to hurry through in the time allotted to me, which is limited——

Mr. WAGNER. I wish to address myself to the very subject as to whether Finland may be regarded as a belligerent under international law.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not care anything about the technical situation. Russia says she is not at war. Finland says she is not at war.

Mr. WAGNER. And under international law she is not a belligerent. That is the point.

Mr. ADAMS. Very well. I am speaking of nations who are fighting each other. I do not care how they may be termed. When there is a controversy between two nations, even though it be called by some other name, and people are killed by the thousands and the tens of thousands, I think it is time for the United States of America to keep its nose out. We have sympathy for Finland, yes; we are hopeful that Finland may win; we are hopeful that China may win; but the United States has its own interests, and, as the great man who first led this country said, "Europe has a set of primary interests" in which we should not become involved.

I think that if we allow our sympathies to carry us away we will do injury to our own country. I am fearful of that. One friend among men is worth a dozen enemies. One friend among nations is worth a dozen enemies. Why should we deliberately affront two nations—Russia and Japan—whether we approve or disapprove of their conduct? If we aid those with whom they are engaged in conflict, they are bound to resent it. They are not concerned with the technical definitions which we may have put into our laws.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator a question. The Senator says "put into our laws." Is not the proclamation of the President concerning the Neutrality Act simply a method of determining when the regulations under that act shall go into effect? The proclamation of the President simply recognizes the actual state of war, and then puts into effect the Neutrality Act.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the Senator doubt there is an actual state of war in Finland?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly not. I do not think anyone in the United States does.

Mr. ADAMS. And can the President by withholding the proclamation keep it from being an actual state of war?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly not. But, of course, the proclamation puts into effect the Neutrality Act.

Mr. ADAMS. The proclamation is a means by which the rights of the American citizens are suspended.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is all.

Mr. ADAMS. As a matter of fact, we have suspended the rights for which thousands and thousands of American boys gave their lives. I can vision the spirits of Washington and Jackson looking down upon a great nation and contemplating the surrender of those rights. The Congress has done it, and I am willing to abide by its action. But I say that if we do those things in connection with one conflict, let us be consistent; or if we do not believe in the Neutrality Act, let us repeal it. Why should we render aid to Finland and to China and refuse to render aid to Canada, our great neighbor on the north?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Admitting for the sake of argument or for any other sake that an actual war——

Mr. ADAMS. "Argument" is an entirely sufficient reason for me to have such an admission made.

Mr. BARKLEY. Admitting that there is a state of war between Russia and Finland, does not the Senator agree that two other conditions must exist to justify the President in proclaiming such a state of war, to wit, that the peace of the United States is endangered by that conflict and that the lives of American citizens are endangered? All three of those conditions must come together in order to justify or make it possible for him to issue a proclamation.

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that if we render aid to belligerents I think the lives of American citizens are being endangered and the welfare of the United States is being endangered, and that the obligation of making that decision rests upon us, the Members of the United States Senate. I think that if we intervene in any way, directly or indirectly, to help one belligerent we jeopardize the peace and welfare of the United States and the safety of its citizens.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. The President cannot issue a proclamation on the theory that a loan we may make will endanger the peace of the United States or the lives of the people of the United States. He must find that the state of war which exists endangers the lives of our people.

Mr. ADAMS. I am not at all concerned about the proclamation of the President. I am talking about facts as they exist in the world today. War exists. What shall we do? I am saying that under whatever guise we proceed, if we render aid to one belligerent we invite the enmity of the other belligerent, and incite in the breasts of the American people those emotions which may sweep us into war.

America has its own troubles. Time after time I have worked in committees and have stood on the floor of the Senate and asked Senators to restrict the funds for beneficial agencies in the United States because of the financial troubles in America. How could I stand on the floor of the Senate and ask the Senate to restrict aid or assistance to American citizens or agencies, and at the same time say, "We have millions enough to make loans abroad"?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. PEPPER. Does the Senator think it would aid American economy, particularly the export business of the United States, if such nations as Russia should gobble up the little nations of Europe?

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, if the United States should become involved in war it would mean disaster to the people of the United States. I am more concerned with the welfare of American boys, American mothers, and American families than with export trade.

Mr. PEPPER. The reason why I confine the question to dollars and cents is that the Senator was talking about having been on the floor of the Senate and pleading for economy in dollars and cents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Colorado on the amendment has expired.

Mr. ADAMS. I will take time on the bill.

Mr. PEPPER. Does not the Senator recognize that the kind of world this is to be is, to a considerable extent, to be determined by settling the question of whether or not the sort of thing Russia is now doing to Finland may be carried on with impunity in what purports to be an orderly and civilized world?

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the Senator that from the experience of the past few years I think the Senator and I and other Senators cannot prevent the ravages of war in Europe. The aggressor and the oppressor will ravage the soil of Europe and of Asia. What I am interested in is that we shall preserve upon the continent of North America a place where democratic institutions may flourish, and where we may conduct our own business in our own way; and I am unwilling to have our country do anything which would involve us in European problems, regardless of our sympathies.

Mr. PEPPER. I do not wish to take any further time of the Senator. Will he yield for one more question?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. PEPPER. If the French nation had not interested itself in a certain situation a long time ago, democracy perhaps would not be flourishing in this country today as it now is.

Mr. ADAMS. I will say specifically to the Senator, who voted for the Neutrality Act, as I did, that if the policy of the Neutrality Act had been in effect from 1776 to 1783 there would have been no United States of America, because it would have prevented loans from France to the United States. However, there is another phase to those loans. We tried to obtain some loans from another section of Europe and were refused. In view of this particular controversy I suggest that the Senator check up on some of the countries which refused loans to the United States in its distress.

Mr. President, as I was saying, I have no objection to the Export-Import Bank making loans to American industries to carry on an export business; but I have yet to be persuaded that the Export-Import Bank, which is the United States, should make loans to foreign governments in order that they may buy of American industry—not only make loans to foreign governments and their agencies, but agree with the American exporter that if the foreign buyers do not pay for what they buy, the United States Government will stand anywhere from one-half to all the loss. I am willing to lend money to the Baldwin Locomotive Co. so that it may manufacture and sell locomotives to Mexico if it does not have the capital; but why should the United States lend money to Mexico to buy locomotives from the Baldwin Locomotive Co. and pay for them if they are not paid for by Mexico? That is not a profitable kind of export business if, instead of making the margin of profit the exporter makes, we lose 50, 75, 85, or 100 percent of the cost of the export or the loan. Therefore I am not enthusiastic about increasing the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank, which has been engaged in making what are actually foreign loans to South America. It is said that it made a profit. It also has a $6,000,000 loan to Poland which has not yet been entered on the books; and there are other loans. I think the theory is not sound.

However, that is not the point. The point is that we propose to make a loan through the Export-Import Bank to belligerents. The bill before us has the history of its purpose written on its face. No matter what amendments we may adopt, the history is on the face of the legislation. We cannot increase the capital of the Export-Import Bank and say, "We are increasing the capital merely for general export purposes." We started out to make a loan to a warring nation. We started out to increase a loan to another warring nation. I am concerned with the consequences to ourselves.

As I see it, the American horizon is already dark with threatening storms. The soothsayers are busy explaining away the darkness and the evil portents. In some slight recognition of facts, the Congress is reducing appropriations. Many activities have had to be reduced because deficits continued and debts increased. We should not give away money or make precarious loans to foreign nations when money is needed at home.

One further word. My obligation is at home. I am interested in the success of the oppressed nations and those against whom aggression is leveled. My sympathies take me with the bill. My judgment takes me the other way. I think my obligation as a Senator and as a citizen requires that I follow my judgment as to what is for the welfare of my country. I shall vote today, not for Finland, not for China, but for America. I do not want our people involved in foreign wars. I want our boys—my boys—kept at home.

Mr. REYNOLDS obtained the floor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. Only 1 more hour of discussion remains before we vote. The agreement on Friday to limit debate beginning at 3 o'clock today fixed the limit at not more than 20 minutes on any amendment and not more than 20 minutes on the bill, which makes a total of 40 minutes. I think it might be well further to limit debate from now on. I ask unanimous consent that during the remainder of the consideration of the bill no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes on the bill or any amendment. That would permit a total of 20 minutes if any Senator wished to occupy that much time. Without such an arrangement it is possible that only one or two more Senators could be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I ask the Senator from Kentucky what the purpose of the request is. Only an hour remains.

Mr. BARKLEY. The purpose of it is to enable more Senators to make brief remarks. Under the present arrangement any Senator taking 40 minutes, which he could do, would consume all but 20 minutes of the time, and probably only two speeches could be made. The suggested arrangement would enable a larger number of Senators to discuss the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is another difficulty with regard to amendments. The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] is now pending. No other amendment may be offered until that amendment is disposed of. Therefore a Senator may not discuss his own amendment until it is in order. It seems to me that we are consuming the time in which Senators might be able to discuss their own amendments.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wonder if the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] would be willing to vote now on the pending amendment.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. In the meantime, I should like to have my request passed upon.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the original agreement on Friday last was that after 3 o'clock today no Senator should speak longer than 20 minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The RECORD shows an agreement for a limitation to 20 minutes on the bill or any amendment, which, added together, make 40 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do not care what the RECORD shows. The agreement was to limit debate to 20 minutes after 3 o'clock. Each Senator was to have the right to speak for 20 minutes after 3 o'clock.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is mistaken about that——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I may be mistaken, but I do not think so.

Mr. BARKLEY. For the request was put in the usual form, which is always that no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes on the bill or on any amendment thereto. That is the way it was put, or that is the way I intended to put it. Probably it would have been better to have limited debate to 10 minutes then, but, anyway, that is what I am trying to do now. Under the rule, the Senator has just seen the Senator from Colorado, after he had spoken 20 minutes on the bill, speak a portion of another 20 minutes on the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I wonder why?

Mr. BARKLEY. Because he had a right to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. He had a right under the agreement made?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator says that was the agreement, very well; but I would not cut down the limit now to 10 minutes for the few Senators who may desire to speak.

Mr. BARKLEY. That will give twice as many Senators an opportunity to speak as would be given if there were no further limitation. The Senator from North Carolina desires to address the Senate now.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Does the Senator from North Carolina expect to speak for 10 minutes?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I expect to speak for 20 minutes, but if I can finish in less time than that I will be very glad to do so, as, perhaps, other Senators may desire to speak.

Mr. BARKLEY. If each Senator consumed the full time he might consume under the modified arrangement, only three Senators could speak between now and 5 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair may state, for the benefit of the Senate, that eight Senators still desire to be heard, if that has any weight on the situation.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. BARKLEY. Question!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kentucky? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BARKLEY. Now, I suggest that the Senate vote at this time on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER].

Mr. DANAHER. Reserving the right to object, I wish I could be allowed 5 minutes on the pending amendment. Then I would be willing to have a vote.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is the amendment which we have been discussing all day. If the Senator wants 5 minutes on his amendment, some other Senator might want 10 minutes against it.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should like 5 minutes against it, if the Senator from Connecticut is to speak further for it.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, on Friday last I listened with a great deal of interest to the debate in this Chamber, including what the able junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] had to say. At that time he discussed very intelligently and in a most scholarly manner the question whether or not in making this contemplated loan we would be violating international law or would be acting contrary to the Constitution of the United States. Insofar as I am concerned, I am not considering whether it would be a violation of international law or whether it would be contrary to the Constitution of the United States. I am against this loan because, as my distinguished colleague the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has frequently said, I am of the opinion that it would unquestionably put us further on the road to war, for we are already on the road to war, having bought shares in the war of Asia and having made a purchase of stock in the war that is now raging in Europe.

I likewise listened with a great deal of interest to the very glowing and eloquent words that fell from the lips of our distinguished and beloved colleague the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] when he stated that, so far as he was concerned, he would support the pending bill and vote to let Finland have an additional $10,000,000. I gather from his remarks that he is going to vote for the bill to let Finland have $10,000,000 in order that the Finns may utilize that amount in fighting communism, which is spreading over the face of the earth. The Senator from Maryland described very vividly, in eloquent words, the distressful things that have been taking place in Russia, the murder of thousands upon thousands of priests, the destruction of churches and cathedrals, the starvation several years ago of from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 people in the Russian Ukraine and in the vicinity of Odessa, on the Black Sea. Insofar as his opposition to communism is concerned, I stand in accord with him 100 percent.

Then, this afternoon it was my privilege, as always I consider it to be a privilege, to listen again to the able senior Senator from the great State of Utah [Mr. KING]. I agree with him in every single word he had to say in condemnation of communism and of that murderer, the greatest murderer the world has ever known—Joseph Stalin. I wish that the able Senator from Maryland and the able Senator from Utah could go further with me and say, in fighting danger, in wiping out a scourge, in destroying that which eventually will destroy us unless first we destroy it, namely, communism, that we should begin cleaning house here at home, that we should destroy communism in the United States of America before we attempt to send dollars abroad to any foreign country to destroy bolshevism and communism there. Our duty is first to the American people; our duty is first to the 130,000,000 patriots of this great country of ours; our duty is first to protect the people of the United States of America; our duty is to destroy communism and all other such damnable isms within the confines of the United States before we become so charitable as to want to destroy communism in other countries with the dollars produced by the sweat of the brow of the American taxpayer. Have we communism here? We all read. Thank heaven we may. In view of the fact that my time is limited I shall not consume any of it by reading the press reports I have before me, but here is one that I clipped the other day from the columns of the Washington Times-Herald entitled—

YOUTH PARLEY OUSTS TWO IN ROW ON "REDS"

* * * * * * *

Two of the anti-Communist block were carried out of the meeting bodily, while the third, Archibald D. Roosevelt, stalked out in anger.

Two patriotic youths of America, in a gathering 4,000 or more strong, beneath the shadow of this Capitol, were fighting communism in the ranks of the youth of America, and what happened? Here, within a stone's throw from the point where we now sit, the two American youths defending the American form of government, two courageous young men of our own land, preaching the doctrines of our form of government, were kicked bodily out on their ears by the young Communists of America—a shame and an outrage. If we want to fight communism, let us fight it here at home before we spend the dollars of American taxpayers abroad.

I have another clipping before me from the same publication under the headline—

Youth Congress ejects delegate; hails Communists.

In the article it is stated:

F. Stephen McArthur, president of the Kearny (N. J.) Young Democrat Club, was ejected from the Citizenship Institute of the American Youth Congress last night when he attempted to introduce a resolution calling for expulsion of the Young Communist League and its "red" front groups from the youth organization.

He was kicked out bodily and the police of the Capital—the Capital of our country—had to rescue him from the Communist youths there who bodily ejected him from that meeting.

I am against communism; I have been fighting it for years, and I say that there are too few of the American people who are fighting communism in this country today. If we are going to spend any money in fighting communism, as some want to do, let us spend that money here where our own people are in danger and not send it abroad. In speaking of sending money into communistic territories, I repeat at this juncture that we bought stock in the war in Asia; we bought that stock in the war in Asia when we loaned China $25,000,000. Despite the fact that we are all in sympathy with the great masses of the 400,000,000 or 500,000,000 Chinese, we know that China is an ally of Russia, and every time we send a dollar to China we are aiding her Bolshevik ally, the worst enemy that we have upon the top of this earth.

By the way, I understand that another $25,000,000 is to be loaned by the Export-Import Bank; and this time, instead of buying tung oil, we are buying tin. If we want to carry out our good-neighbor policy, of which we speak so much here and elsewhere, instead of buying tin in China to aid the Communists, let us cast our eyes westward and then southward, and buy tin from the country of Bolivia, which is in a position to furnish it to us, just as good, and in quantities just as great.

Speaking of communism, the Dies committee—which has done more than any other organization we have ever known to uncover the reptile-like activities of communism in this country—revealed the fact that last year the Communists sent here more than $10,887,000 and distributed more than 88,000,000 pieces of literature, with a view to destroying the American form of government.

Earl Browder, the leader of the Communists in this country—recently convicted of passport frauds, and sentenced to a term of 4 years and a fine of $2,000—had the gall and the audacity to announce himself as a candidate for a seat in the House of Representatives; and, lo and behold, despite the fact that he had been discredited, despite the fact that he stood at the bar of public opinion as a criminal, having been convicted in the Federal courts, that man, who openly declared before the Dies committee that if war should come between the United States and Soviet Russia he would endeavor to stop it if he had to go to such lengths as to bring about a civil war, a revolution in the United States——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I beg the pardon of the Chair. I did not start speaking until 3 minutes after 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 10 minutes on the amendment.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Oh, I thank the Chair very much. I now have 10 minutes on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, although Browder stood as a convicted criminal in the eyes of the American public, and had been sentenced, and although he had declared that if war should come between Russia and the United States he would create a revolution in this country to stop it, he secured 3,000 votes in the city of New York. I say the place to stop communism is right here in our own United States.

Mr. President, this bill is designed for the purpose of making a loan to Finland. Nobody will deny that statement. If you do not believe it, read carefully every word of the debate which took place in this Chamber last Friday.

Mr. President, if we want to help Finland there is one way in which we can do it. If we want to help Finland, let us quit helping Russia. Russia is sending into this country millions of dollars of gold for which we are paying $35 an ounce, though it costs her only $3 an ounce to mine it and ship it to market.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. REYNOLDS. In that connection, at this juncture I ask that there be published as a part and portion of my remarks a newspaper clipping dated New York, February 9—last Friday, when we were debating this subject—entitled "United States Exports Help Russia Fight Finns. Vast War Stores Moving via Siberia."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

UNITED STATES EXPORTS HELP RUSSIA FIGHT FINNS—VAST WAR STORES MOVING VIA SIBERIA

NEW YORK, February 9 (C. T. P. S.).—While Congress belabors the issue of our continued recognition of Soviet Russia as funds are being raised in the United States to help Finnish noncombatants, and to buy arms for the beleaguered Finns, American copper in swelling quantity, tools, dies, and machines are being routed to Siberia, much of it in Norwegian ships, destined for the use of the "red" army.

Paradoxical as the situation is, shipping circles today conceded the truth of this in general terms.

SHIPPED VIA MEXICO

In a steady and growing stream, ships flying American flags and the flags of neutral countries are carrying copper ore, copper concentrates, and some finished forms of copper, as well as other industrial and technical material to Vladivostok. They sail from New York, Baltimore, San Pedro, Seattle, and Tacoma.

Much of the cargo is shipped only to Manzanillo, Mexico, a generally sleepy west coast port that has burgeoned into an important crossroads of the sea within the last few months.

Manzanillo, seamen say, has become a focal point for this trade in the sinews of war. Into its roadstead glide the rusty, barnacle-encrusted merchant ships of the fleet that flies the hammer and sickle. There they take in the cargo of those ships that cannot or will not make the long crossing to the coast of Siberia.

NEARLY AROUND WORLD

The disruptive character of the war in Europe and of the Allied blockade has made it necessary for these heavy shipments nearly to circumnavigate the globe. From New York, they pass through the Panama Canal; are transshipped, if necessary, at Manzanillo and then make the long crossing to Vladivostok.

From there they are carried overland on the trans-Siberian railroad into the industrial sections of European Russia and, so, to the front in Finland.

Only last Wednesday the Russian freighter Kim discharged $5,600,000 in gold bullion at San Francisco, a risky venture made necessary to replenish her commercial balances in this country. America is selling for cash.

The Kim will head down to Manzanillo to take on bulk cargo for the return to Siberia.

PURCHASES UP 17 PERCENT

With her in this service are steamship Minsk, the steamship Vladimir Mayakovski, and the steamship Frederich Engles, all of them nearly obsolete. Old as they are, they can carry cargo more cheaply than chartered foreign bottoms can, so they are being pushed to the limit to make as many trips as possible.

The Mayakovski sailed yesterday from the California port of San Pedro for Vladivostok with a cargo of 5,000 tons of copper ingots and other metals which she picked up at Manzanillo.

Manzanillo's emergence as an important shipping point came at the same time Russia's purchases of copper started to climb in this country.

Last November the Soviet purchases increased 17 percent.

SOME SHIPPED DIRECT

Shipments of the red metal from the smelting plants at Tacoma have gone direct to Russia. Ten ships loaded at the Tacoma docks in the last 20 days of January. As none of these shipments was destined to Manzanillo, it is apparent that copper from both the east and west coasts is moving in a steady stream direct to Russia. Much of the copper from the Atlantic seaboard, however, is from Chile and other neutral countries, shipped here under bond in crude form and refined before transshipping to Russia.

The White House really is embarrassed by the arrival in this country of Russian gold. Through its gold-buying policy this Government is helping to finance the Russian war against Finland and the Japanese war against China. Japanese shipments of gold to this country have paid for about $300,000,000 worth of war goods.

Real reason why the Treasury continues to buy Russian gold is that the Government is powerless to keep the Russians from sending their yellow metal here except by banning all gold imports from any nation. Soviets could easily sell gold to a neighboring country for remelting, thus eliminating telltale Russian mint stamps. The metal would then be resold to the United States, but without any Russian identification marks.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The harbors in California are filled with the ships of Soviet Russia, which are bringing here their gold and selling it to the American Treasury, and thereafter they buy war supplies for the purpose of killing the Finns.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I will yield if the time required is not taken out of my time. I have only about 8 minutes, and I hope the able leader will pardon me.

Mr. President, we are inconsistent. Let us see. This body lifted—I did not, by my vote; I voted against it—the arms embargo upon instruments of death. I voted against it. We are engaged in manufacturing implements of war. We of the United States are the greatest manufacturers of instruments of death of any nation upon the face of the earth. We are selling millions upon millions of dollars' worth of them. Since the lifting of the embargo, my recollection leads me to believe that we have sold to the French about $122,000,000 worth and not quite so much to the British. We are proposing a loan to Finland of $10,000,000. Inconsistency! But we say to the Finns, "We will let you have $10,000,000, but we will not let you use a penny of it in buying the implements of death that we are manufacturing for the British and for the French for the purpose of killing the Germans and the Russians." The Russians are buying arms. They are buying our supplies to be used in murdering the Finns; and although we are the greatest manufacturers of instruments of death of any country upon the face of the earth, we say to the Finns, "If you get this $10,000,000, you cannot use a penny of it for the purpose of buying arms."

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President——

Mr. REYNOLDS. The Senator will pardon me. I have only a minute.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I wish to call the Senator's attention to an article——

Mr. REYNOLDS. I can see the headlines from here. The Finns are complaining that American airplanes are being used to kill their people. Is my eyesight good or bad?

Mr. LUNDEEN. And shells and bombs.

Mr. REYNOLDS. And shells and bombs.

Mr. President, there is published in North Carolina a newspaper called the News and Observer. It is owned by Hon. Josephus Daniels, the President's appointee as Ambassador to Mexico from our Republic. In an editorial entitled "Money, Then Men," published on February 8, 1940, his son says:

MONEY, THEN MEN

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has approved an increase of $100,000,000 in the capital of the Export-Import Bank in order to provide additional loans of $20,000,000 each for Finland and China.

Undoubtedly most Americans are deeply sympathetic with both Finland and China. But not many Americans are ready to go to war with Japan or Russia or both of them. Yet obviously any loan out of the American Treasury to belligerent nations, regardless of the roundabout way it may go through corporations, is the entry of American resources on the side of some nations in wars in which the other nations on the other side cannot be blamed if they regard such entry as an unneutral act against them. We will not only be fighting for Finland and for China with our money, we will also be fighting against Japan and against Russia with our money.

If the United States does not wish to go to war, it had better not start fighting with its money. If we send our money to fight, it may not be long before we will have to send our men.

He is right.

Another editorial from the same newspaper is as follows:

ON THE WAY TO WAR

If, as Senator KEY PITTMAN says, there is "the greatest desire on the part of the administration" to make a loan in the midst of war to Finland or China, or both, Americans, who wish to serve oppressed peoples in the world far away from home, might well look at the map of the world.

There is such a thing as balance of power. It was disturbed when the old enemies, Russia and Germany, joined each other in Poland. And not even Russian failures in Finland have destroyed the effect of that new, strange alliance. Now the United States at the same time undertakes to act to aid the underdog enemies of both Japan and Russia. These two big, bad countries have been irritated neighbors and enemies but under equal pressure from the United States, they might become friends as quickly as Germany and Russia did. Certainly some people in and out of office in the United States seem anxious to put them under the same pressure from the United States of America. They may succeed only in pressing them together as allies in the east. And it is in the east that America seems most threatened with trouble. Our chances of getting into a war there grow better every time an admiral or a world-saving statesman opens his mouth.

This is a time for people to consider not merely small loans but vast consequences. Let this war spread under our tending to a fighting in which Russia and Japan are drawn together and drawn together as they would be on the side of Germany, and we shall have a world war, indeed. Even if Russia is the inept giant the Finns have made it seem to be, in such a combination with a militant Japan and a militant Germany on each flank, nobody can count its power. Certainly nobody can measure the dimensions of the troubles the United States might have to assume alone in the east for which a hard-pressed England and France would have few forces to spare.

Some Americans may be ready to risk such a war. All Americans should be aware that we are risking it in every unneutral, provocative act against Russia and against Japan. And every assistance to Finland and China in this present world is an act in assistance against Russia and Japan. No American needs condone the brutal ruthlessness of Russia against Finland or Japan against China any more than Americans condoned the rape of Ethiopia by Italy or the aggression of the British against the Boers. But an America, which has often and complacently, if sadly, contemplated indefensible aggression against little peoples by every one of the powers on both sides in this war, ought not to stir to a special militancy in special cases at a time when war is spreading in the world unless it contemplates entry into the full tide of war on this earth.

Increasingly the choice of America becomes imperative. We must choose official neutrality or naked war. We are only self-deluded when we act in pretension that we can go so far and no further, that we can put money to fighting but never men. A violent logic is at work in the world. The little step provides the basis for the big one. The bloody concluding act grows inevitably from small beginnings.

At this moment the United States seems on its way into war, and it will move on that way inevitably unless the American people call a halt to the little acts which will in accumulation take us headlong into the full tragedy of universal war. We cannot have our peace and put our money to war; we must choose between our security and our sympathies.

If we have money to give away, let us give it to the American people, as suggested by the able Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL]. We have in this country today, according to the latest report I clipped from the columns of a United States newspaper, more than 11,000,000 persons out of employment. In addition to that, we have 23,000,000 persons who are employed only part time. In addition to that, we have 300,000 persons in the C. C. C. camps. In addition to that, we have about 3,000,000 persons on the W. P. A. pay roll. In addition to that, as we all know, there are about 4,000,000 persons in the employ of all the respective subdivisions of Government of the United States; and on the question as to whether or not our people are in need, let us see.

Only a few days ago the attention of the Members of this body was called by leading characters in this community of ours to the fact that disgraceful conditions exist within the confines of the District of Columbia. They gave a vivid description of the deplorable conditions existing at Blue Plains. Millions of persons all over the United States are starving, ragged, undernourished, without proper shelter, and then we say we are going to give away more money; we are going to finance somebody else. Why do we not take care of our own?

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am sorry that I cannot yield, if the Senator will pardon me. My time has almost expired.

The Washington Daily News of Thursday, February 8, contains a picture of a mother and her two little sons. Her husband is on W. P. A. at $15 a week. They are undernourished, and she is so poor that she cannot buy milk for the children. They are starving, and she is advertising to the world that she wants somebody to take them and raise them. I cannot have the picture published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but I ask that the article be published.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

ANYONE WANT MY SONS?

COLUMBUS, OHIO, February 8.—Mrs. Fred McNeil, wife of a W. P. A. worker, offered yesterday to give away the two youngest of her five sons so they might have better food and care than her husband's income provides.

Mrs. McNeil said she and her husband had decided to give away their sons, Wilbur, 6, and Paul, 4, if a good home could be found.

"They are good looking boys," she said. "Somebody should be glad to get them."

The other McNeil children are Fred, 14, who weighs only 69 pounds; William, 12, whose school teachers recommended he have more milk, and Herbert, 7.

Another son, Gerald, 2, died last spring of bronchitis, rickets, and undernourishment.

Because of weak legs, Paul is just beginning to walk.

The McNeils said their income never exceeds $15 in any week and that there is never more than $7 a week for food after other bills are paid.

Mr. REYNOLDS. There are millions of children in the slums of the country, some of whom are shown in the picture I have here, entitled:

These youngsters are growing up in the squalor of a metropolitan slum.

Here is a picture of sharecroppers down South, entitled:

Drought-made Dust Bowl refugees of this American family now "on the loose." It, like hundreds of others, roams from the Pacific coast through the Wheat Belt and into the Southwest, "following the harvests." Hunger and exposure are often fellow travelers.

Speaking of the District of Columbia, I obtained a copy of a Washington newspaper of Friday, January 5, commenting upon the starving, the undernourished, and the unfortunate here in the District of Columbia. I ask that it be published in the RECORD. I am sorry I have not any more time to discuss this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article referred to will be published in the RECORD.

The article is as follows:

RELIEF TO FOREIGNERS

As one of your regular readers, I am very much interested to note that you have published a series of articles on the subject of welfare in the District of Columbia. I feel sure your discussions point the way to methods of making the dollars contributed—sometimes with at least some small sacrifice—to worthy welfare projects reach more fully their intended objectives.

I am becoming more and more curious to understand why, in the face of so much unrelieved suffering from poverty, sickness, and unemployment everywhere in our own country, which individuals and Government seem to be failing to substantially overcome, a great many people are being urged to contribute to funds for relief in the remaining parts of the world—war-torn though they be.

My reference to this does not grow out of the slightest lack of sympathy but, rather (possibly), a lack of understanding of facts. An example of what I have in mind is the Committee for Urgent Relief for France, discussed by the Poe Sisters in the Times-Herald of February 3.

If there is a proper place in your paper for discussion of my thought, I feel sure it would prove interesting to a very great many of your readers.—B. B.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in closing I want to say that when we made the first loan to Finland, immediately after they began their war, we bought our first share of stock in the European war; and when we made the first loan to China, we bought our first share of stock in that war.

I hope peace will soon come; but what chance is there that that will happen? Very little. I am glad Mr. Sumner Welles went abroad for the purpose of trying to stop the war. The newspapers said he went there to call for peace. The newspapers said he went there for the purpose of asking the world to disarm; and what inconsistency. The very idea. We are the laughing stock of the world to ask the world to disarm when we are the very ones who are bringing about more armament of the world than any other nation upon the face of the earth, selling millions upon millions of dollars of such instruments.

We lifted the arms embargo to help the Allies. We are selling munitions to England and France. We insist upon making a loan to Finland for the purpose of helping her, but we defeat that purpose by refusing her the sale of munitions which she needs more than anything else.

While selling arms to Europe, we are now insisting that an arms embargo be placed in Asia. We are thereby insisting upon one foreign policy for Europe and another for Asia. We are telling the Finns to whale hell out of the Russians, but at the same time we will not provide them with anything with which to do the whaling. We are giving lip service to the Finns, and giving material service to the Russians by buying their gold and providing them with war materials. We are further aiding the Russians by making loans to their allies, the Chinese, for handling the Japs, to keep them off Great Britain while she is busy in Europe. We are looking wise while speaking dumb, and speaking wise—maybe—while looking dumb. We are blowing hot and cold at the same time. We say "Yes" and "No" at the same time. We have destroyed our chance to aid in world peace because we are not neutral. We send Sumner Welles to Europe to secure peace, and after the war to reduce armaments, while we are supplying the armaments. Why not reduce armaments now, before the killing is done? Why wait to take the gun away from the murderer after he has committed the crime?

Mr. President, I ask that the other articles which I send to the desk be placed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE NEW ESTIMATES OF UNEMPLOYMENT

As the barometer shows, latest estimates place the total number of unemployed at 9,400,000—only 4 percent below the level of a year ago.

December and January have been busy months for manufacturing industries. As a consequence, factory employment increased by almost three-quarters of a million. Other nonfarm industries put on another 500,000.

Over the same period, however, from 500,000 to 600,000 new young persons have entered the labor market. At the same time farm employment has declined. The result is that unemployment has been reduced only fractionally.

A. F. OF L. ESTIMATE CLOSE

This unofficial estimate is furnished by the Department of Commerce.

Of the other available estimates of unemployment, that of Boris Shishkin, chief economist for the American Federation of Labor, is in closest agreement with the Department of Commerce. Mr. Shishkin's latest estimate fixes the number of unemployed at approximately 9,370,000. The C. I. O. unemployment division estimates 10,000,000 persons currently unemployed.

NEUTRAL TALKS LAUNCHED; WELLES NAMED "ENVOY"

(By Doris Fleeson and Fred Pasley)

A drive for world peace was launched yesterday by President Roosevelt in two separate and decisive moves:

One. Formation of a powerful antiwar bloc among neutral nations undertaken by the State Department.

Two. Appointment of Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles as the administration's "Colonel House" to confer with governmental heads of Germany, France, Great Britain, and Italy.

CONVERSATIONS BEGUN

Couching its momentous announcement in the careful language of diplomacy, the State Department disclosed conversations between this country and neutrals had already begun and would shortly be extended to all nations at peace.

These talks, the announcement continued, are in the nature of preliminary inquiries relating to a sound international economic system, and at the same time world-wide reduction of armaments.

Then, in a gesture of amity to nations at war, the announcement concluded: "These conversations can, of course, be extended to belligerent nations insofar as they involve these two common problems of future peace."

If Adolf Hitler indicates the slightest desire to see Sumner Welles, Under Secretary of State, Mr. Welles will visit the German dictator to sound out his ideas on peace. President Roosevelt is hopeful that a basis for peace can be found before fighting really gets under way in Europe.

The public will soon be told of a good-neighbor plan to buy Bolivian tin. American officials are making arrangements to expand this country's imports of Bolivian ore. The White House and Army think it would be smart politics and smart defense to buy tin ore directly from Bolivia and smelt it here.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in the debate on this bill on February 9 the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] mentioned appropriations by Congress to pay $25,000,000 to Denmark for the Virgin Islands and appropriations to pay Colombia for the alleged wrong in seizing what now constitutes the Panama Canal Zone, previously a part of Colombia's territory. He stated that there was no specific constitutional authority for those payments, and that, so far as he knew, their validity had not been challenged.

The purchase of the Virgin Islands and the payments made for Panama Canal Zone rights are not analogous to loans by our Government to the governments of nations at war. The United States has the constitutional and international law right to buy and acquire rights in foreign territory (Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 279), Wilson v. Shaw (204 U. S. 24).) It has done so repeatedly since 1803—in the Louisiana Purchase from France that year, the Gadsen Purchase from Mexico in 1853, the Alaska cession by Russia in 1867, the Panama Canal Zone payments to Panama and Colombia, and the Virgin Islands purchase from Denmark in 1916. These purchases involved the acquisition of additional territory as part of the national domain. They were part of the national expansion program of the United States to round out its continental territory and national defense. They were valid exercises of the constitutional powers of Congress under the authority of the treaty-making power—article II, section 2, clause 2. Every appropriation authorized by Congress to acquire foreign territory was made pursuant to preexisting obligations undertaken in a treaty between the United States and a foreign country. These treaties between the United States and France, Mexico, Russia, Panama, Colombia, and Denmark were a valid exercise of the treaty-making power. They involved a legitimate exercise of that power under the Constitution as matters of international concern. They were equally valid under international law. No question of war and neutrality was involved.

There is no treaty at present between the United States and Finland which imposes on the United States any obligation to make a loan to Finland. No territorial purchase by the United States from Finland is contemplated. The analogy of the proposed loan to territorial purchases has no relation in fact or in law.

From a legal standpoint a loan by the United States, a neutral Government, to Finland, a belligerent, would violate both the Constitution and international law.

There is no constitutional authority for Congress while the United States is at peace to authorize a loan out of the Treasury or from public funds to a foreign government except under the treaty-making power.

The treaty-making power arises under and is limited by the Constitution, which provides that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur"—article II, section 2, clause 2. While the Congress may not be in a position to take certain action under the Constitution in the absence of a treaty, it may have authority under a properly negotiated treaty to take the same action. It has been held by the Supreme Court that the powers of the Congress under a properly negotiated treaty regarding a legitimate matter of international concern are modified according to the provisions of such treaty in order to enable the United States to carry out its international obligations (Missouri v. Holland, 252 U. S. 416; 1920).

On the other hand, if the United States Government were prepared to become an ally of the Government of Finland and enter the present European war on the northern flank, the factual and legal situation would be entirely different. When the United States is at war the Congress has the power to use the national credit for the national defense, and, if necessary, to make loans to foreign governments who are allies of the United States. Under the war powers in the Constitution, the United States, during the World War, made extensive loans to foreign governments. It will be recalled that the only authority under the Liberty Loan Acts to make loans out of the Treasury to the allies of the United States was for "the national security and defense and for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war."

The Liberty Bond Acts authorized the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to establish credits in favor of foreign governments engaged in war with enemies of the United States, and, to the extent of those credits, to make advances to such governments through the purchase at par of their respective obligations. Under this authority, loans were made during the war and after the armistice for the purpose, in general, of enabling the respective governments to meet commitments made in the United States in connection with the prosecution of the war (Treasury Department, memorandum covering the indebtedness of foreign governments to the United States and showing total amounts paid by Germany under the Dawes and Young plans. March 1, 1939, pp. 1–2).

Under the provisions of the Liberty Loan Acts, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to make loans to the Allied governments only out of credits established in their favor with the approval of the President before the declaration of peace. (Rathbourne, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, foreign affairs, April 1925.)

When the war between the United States and Germany was officially terminated on April 2, 1921, no further credits were extended to foreign governments, although two cash advances under credits previously extended were thereafter made to Czechoslovakia and Greece to settle outstanding war commitments. The sorry story of default on the war loans is too well known to be reviewed here. The total unpaid indebtedness, principal and interest, as of December 15, 1939, was $13,345,045,673.56, over one-fourth of our total staggering national debt.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I am taking the privilege accorded to every member of the committee to say that when I voted to report the pending bill, when it came before the Committee on Foreign Relations, I did so with the distinct understanding that I should do exactly as I pleased when it came upon the floor. I am now taking that privilege.

I wish to have printed in juxtaposition the bill as it came to us from the two committees, and the bill which ultimately we evolved, which is now before us. I want to print them so that every man here may understand that what was originally a bill for the relief of Finland was transmuted by the clever hands which wrote the subsequent bill into a measure for the relief of the Export-Import Bank of Washington.

The first bill, the so-called Brown bill, for which I had a great deal of sympathy, and for which I would rather vote than the particular bill now before us, read as follows:

That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans to the Republic of Finland in an aggregate amount not exceeding $60,000,000, for the purpose of enabling the Republic of Finland to finance the purchase of such articles and materials (whether or not such articles and materials are the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States or any of its Territories or possessions) as it deems necessary. All such loans shall be made on such terms and conditions as the Federal Loan Administrator shall prescribe.

SEC. 2. In order to provide funds to carry out the purposes of this act, the amount of notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered under section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, to have outstanding at any one time is hereby increased by $60,000,000.

That is a straight bill. It announces the purpose that was in the minds of probably nine-tenths of the Members of the Senate and of many of the people of this country. It provides for a loan to be made to Finland, a loan of $60,000,000, and around it were no such conditions as are about the particular measure which confronts us today. As reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill read:

That section 9 of the act approved January 31, 1935 (49 Stat. 4), as amended, is amended (1), by striking out "$100,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$200,000,000"; and (2), by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans to any one borrower outstanding and authorized at any one time shall not exceed $30,000,000: Provided further, That the Export-Import Bank of Washington shall not make any loans in violation of international law as interpreted by the Department of State or for the purchase of any articles listed as arms, ammunition, or implements of war by the President of the United States in accordance with the Neutrality Act of 1939."

The bill now under consideration provides:

That section 9 of the act approved January 31, 1935 (49 Stat. 4), as amended, is amended (1), by striking out "$100,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$200,000,000"; and (2), by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans to any one foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof which are hereafter authorized to be made and are outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $20,000,000, and such amount shall be in addition to the amount of loans heretofore authorized or made to such foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof: Provided further, That the Export-Import Bank of Washington shall not make any loans in violation of international law as interpreted by the Department of State or for the purchase of any articles listed as arms, ammunition, or implements of war by the President of the United States in accordance with the Neutrality Act of 1939."

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and for other purposes."

There is not in the bill before us a single word about Finland. All the tears we may shed over the unhappy situation of the people of Finland, all the encomiums we may offer in behalf of the bravery of that people, all that we may say in praise of the citizens of Finland, is apart from the particular measure which confronts us. There is not a word said in this measure about loans to Finland, how they shall be granted, when they shall be granted, or what shall be done in relation to them. Everything is left to the discretion of one man, a capable and a very brilliant man, doubtless, but all is to be left to his determination. He even says to us in his testimony given before the Committee on Foreign Relations that he does not know how much he will lend to Finland. If he thinks they are entitled to $10,000,000 and can repay that amount, he perhaps will lend them that much. He will ask them to come back subsequently. There is not anything in relation to this whole subject matter except the giving of $100,000,000 more to the Export-Import Bank of Washington.

Why is that? I will not pretend to say, although I have before me the letter written by the President upon the subject. But I assume that because those who framed the bill were limited by the President's letter, because the letter was phrased in such a fashion that they did not desire to run counter to it, the bill came to us from the Banking and Currency Committee in the form to which I have referred.

Keep in mind in all this discussion that no one, in a bill, asks that money be appropriated for Finland, no one, in a bill that is presented to us, asks for a certain loan to Finland. All we would do is to say that the Export-Import Bank should have $100,000,000 more with which to transact its business, or do as it might see fit.

Mr. Jones, the head of the Export-Import Bank, says that he will make a loan to Finland of probably $10,000,000, he does not know the amount with certainty, but he will make a loan to Finland, and he will do subsequently as he determines, having regard to whether that loan can be paid or not. So the amounts we have been discussing today, the very things with which we have dealt concerning Finland's loans, are out of the window, and all we have before us is a proposal to increase by $100,000,000 the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank, a portion of which we hope will be loaned to Finland ultimately.

Mr. President, this is a contest between the head and the heart. In his heart every man in this body wants Finland to win. Every man in this body who has a spark of manhood in him, and people all through this country desire that loans or aid shall be given to Finland, and all of us alike have but one mind—to aid Finland if we can do it, and do it with no peculiar consequences to follow thereafter, and, from a long-range view of the circumstances, without any harm to this country of ours.

It would be crippling to a man's intellect, it seems to me, to argue the technicalities of whether or not war exists in Finland today. In view of the peculiar way in which some people have argued on this floor about the existence of a war in that part of the world, it would be a work of supererogation in which we should not indulge. I will not indulge in it while I am talking. Whether a war exists or not is a question of fact, and who can say that that question of fact has not been determined in Finland?

Will anyone tell me that no war exists there because Russia slyly says "No war do we have," and because Finland follows and says, "We are not at war"? With men dying in temperatures of 30 to 40 degrees below zero, other men being blown to pieces by artillery and by bombs from airplanes, with the women and children suffering as women and children always suffer in warfare, am I to be told that no war exists? Upon that sort of stuff I would not make a finding in relation to any matter.

No war exists in Finland? Read the dispatches received every day. That is all one need do, read about what is taking place in Finland, read of the men in white uniforms fighting, fighting, fighting. Read of all of those transactions, of the shot and shell, and everything that accompanies warfare that is real, and then say to me that there is no war in Finland because the people of Finland have said there is no war, and the Bear, smiling, guilefully says, "We are making no war upon Finland."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). The time of the Senator on the amendment has expired. The Senator has 10 minutes upon the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I will take my time on the bill.

A large part of the membership of this body has determined, doubtless, that war does not exist in Finland. A large number, from that premise, having reached the conclusion that war does not exist, hold that therefore no rules of warfare obtain. A large number in this body have found that, as a matter of fact, no war exists in Finland, and therefore they reach the conclusion, from that finding, that there is no neutrality law in effect, and that there is no law at all which can apply to that particular territory, so far as we are concerned. That is rank nonsense; that is all there is to it. It is not well for any of us to cripple our intellects by arguing the question of war in Finland. It exists there. It exists horribly. I have never heard a man say that he thought other than one way in relation to that war and how it should terminate. Opinion is all one way, and I do not know of any exception.

I call Senators' attention to the fact that the bill accords to the Export-Import Bank $100,000,000. You can strike out the entire bill and there exists power enough, authority enough, now in the Export-Import Bank, to do everything that the most enthusiastic advocate for Finland desires to do.

Mr. President, there is nothing to prevent such a loan as they may desire being made. There is nothing to prevent the consummation of a contract exactly as they may wish to write it. We have the proof of that in the fact that a contract exists today the power to write which contract exists solely in the Export-Import Bank, and Finland today has paid back a portion of that loan. Senators recall the testimony on that subject. There is still a portion of the debt due today. Finland has been a good debtor, and the Export-Import Bank could, if it desired, leave this whole transaction to take its regular course within the Export-Import Bank. Do Senators realize that? No additional authority is needed here, none at all. The Export-Import Bank has ample authority to make the loan if it desires. The Export-Import Bank wants the legislation passed, of course, because it will give them $100,000,000 more with which to play and to utilize as they see fit.

Do Senators recall the speech made today by the Senator from Maine, who told us that the Export-Import Bank has loans outstanding in 56 countries of the world. To all the world we have become a wet nurse and all regard us as a sort of Santa Claus, and all the world draws on us whenever it sees fit to do so. The only thing that holds back the officials of the bank in the slightest degree is a little act which is in effect. But they can do just exactly as they did before in the matter of lending to China or lending to Finland—exactly the same.

Senators, we are dealing here with a bill which does not provide for the lending of money to Finland, but for the giving of $100,000,000 more to the Export-Import Bank for it to loan. If Senators wish to do that, very well, they have a right to do it. But do not do it under the guise of doing something for Finland, because that is not needed in any particular.

The bill puts restrictions on making certain sorts of loans, and says the borrower shall not spend the money for arms, ammunition and implements of war, but Mr. Jones makes perfectly plain that he cannot, and his corporation cannot do more than see that that sale is made; and see the goods loaded on the boat at the shore, but beyond that he cannot go.

I see that our friend on the other side of the aisle is getting very restless, and I shall give the remainder of the time to him, because I said I would. In addition, we all want to hear the Senator from Kentucky. So Senators will have that opportunity.

I wish to speak for just 1 or 2 more minutes. I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech made today by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS]. I feel indeed just as he does. I will give to Finland and give until it hurts, so far as I am personally concerned. I will do anything within the bounds of reason to help Finland. But I am first an American, and as an American I stand here saying that you should not do aught that would carry us into the vortex of war. We may not be taken into the war by what we do, but we may be taken into war. I want to keep the skirts of my country clean. I do not want to lay the foundation for our country hereafter to go into war or to become involved in any conflict whatsoever. I have no apology to make when the spending of my country's money is at stake, and the future welfare of my country is involved. It is on that account, for my country and for your country, that I insist this loan should not be made.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, we have but 18 minutes remaining, and I feel that the majority leader should have a portion of that time. If I am not interrupted to any great extent I shall try to yield the floor at about 10 minutes to 5, so that he may have the remainder of the time.

First, I wish to say a word about the question of international law. We have not the time to give it the consideration it deserves, but let me say that the Senate of the United States has spoken on that subject. We have definitely taken a position. That position was officially taken by the Senate in the year 1928. The present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States headed the United States delegation to the Habana Conference in that year, and the Habana Convention of 1928 provided as follows:

> The neutral state is forbidden—
> (a) To deliver to the belligerent directly or indirectly or for any reason whatever, ships of war, munitions or any other war material;
> (b) —

And this is the point that applies to that situation—

> To grant to it any loans, or to open credits for it during the duration of the war.

Continuing the quotation from the Habana Convention:

> Credits that a neutral state may give to facilitate the sale or exportation of its food products and raw materials are not included in this prohibition.

The ratification of that convention by the Senate of the United States provided a definite statement by the Senate that that was the international law by which we would abide in our relations with the peoples of the world.

The pending bill in no way contravenes the Habana Convention. Some may say that that convention does not apply to European affairs. It was a declaration of the attitude of the American states in the so-called Pan American Union as to what our idea of international law was. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], who made the main argument upon this proposition, himself says that the bill does not contravene international law.

We ought not to be unneutral in this matter, and that is the reason why the bill originally introduced is not the bill now before the Senate. I think the original bill may have been unneutral.

Let me say a word as to the situation in which we find ourselves today. As has been pointed out by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and as was pointed out in the New York Times of Sunday last, the Russian Government is buying war supplies from the people of the United States. It can buy them on credit, and, Mr. President, it is buying such supplies with our money. We loaned Russia $392,000,000. It has not repaid us a cent of that money. That is the amount of its indebtedness to us today. If Russia had paid that money, it is not likely it would have the funds with which to buy munitions of war from the people of the United States.

Look at the other side. The little nation of Finland, which is making its brave fight against odds of 50 to 1 in manpower, paid us, and is current, up to date, in what is owing us. It is the only nation in the world that has so paid us.

If Finland had retained that money; if she had taken the attitude the Russian Government has taken, she would have had millions of dollars with which to buy munitions of war. Finland does not have the money now, because she paid it to us. If we can correct that situation and do it in an entirely neutral way, conforming to the principles of international law—and it is conceded that we can do so under this bill—then, Senators, we ought to do it. We ought to correct the injustice and provide the small amount of money which is provided in the bill for loans to the Finnish Government.

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] says the Export-Import Bank can now make these loans. That is not possible under the financial condition of the Export-Import Bank today. The bank has loaned $64,000,000. It is committed to lend $50,000,000 more. That is $14,000,000 more than the amount it is authorized to loan. It cannot make the loan to Finland unless we increase its loanable funds by the action which we hope will be taken under the provisions of the bill.

Let no Senator make any mistake. A vote for the bill is a vote for a loan to Finland; and certainly a vote against the bill will be taken by the Federal Loan Administrator and by the directors of the Export-Import Bank as an express direction that we do not want them to make any further loans to the Finnish Republic.

The issue is clear. Shall we, within the bounds of international law, in an entirely neutral way, advance additional funds to Finland, or shall we not do so? That is the issue. A "nay" vote means no loan to Finland, and a "yea" vote means a loan to Finland.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in the time remaining it will probably be impossible to do more than touch on two or three of what seem to be the salient features of this measure and objections to it as depicted by those who are opposed to it.

In the first place, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] that the bill before us is not the bill which was originally introduced by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN], of course the only answer that can be made is that that statement is true. However, it carries no significance whatever. The Senator from Michigan originally introduced a bill providing for a direct loan of $60,000,000 from the Government of the United States to the Government of Finland. That bill was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the committee rewrote the bill practically in the language now before us. The Senator from Michigan could have introduced a new bill embodying the substitute written by the committee; and that procedure was discussed in the committee. The Senator from Michigan preferred to retain the number of his bill as introduced and to have the substitute brought in as an amendment to his original bill; but it accomplishes the same purpose as though the Senator had introduced a new bill and the committee had reported it.

Mr. President, the pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], which prohibits any loans out of these funds to any foreign country. There is nothing in the bill which by its terms authorizes a loan to a foreign country. The bill does not change the law under which the Export-Import Bank has operated for the past 4 or 5 years. There is nothing in the original law which says anything about a loan to a foreign country; and there is nothing in it which prohibits a loan to a foreign country. Whatever loans are made out of the additional capital stock under the new authorization will be made in the same manner in which such loans have been made up to this time. So the Senator's amendment, if it means anything, means that out of the additional fund the bank cannot make a loan to anybody for the benefit of a foreign country. If it has any effect at all, that is what it would do. The theory of the bill and of the original act was primarily to benefit the industries and agricultural interests of the United States. Therefore, the amendment is futile.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] has indicated that he may offer an amendment to prohibit the purchase of gold sent to the United States from Russia or gold mined in Russia. I hope he will not offer that amendment, because it would do Finland no good for us to stop selling goods to Russia. All the gold that is coming in from all the countries is coming in in exchange for goods which we are selling; and if we desire to stop American factories or farms from producing, then we can pass a law which would attempt to stop the method by which payment may be made for the goods produced. That would not help Finland and would hurt only the United States.

I understand that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] is to offer an amendment to reduce the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank by $50,000,000.

Mr. President, nearly a year ago the Senate of the United States voted to increase the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank by $75,000,000. Mr. Jones and the administration—I think the suggestion was included in a message from the President—asked Congress to increase the capital stock of the bank by $100,000,000. No war in Europe was then on the surface. Germany had not yet invaded Poland. She had taken Austria and Czechoslovakia, but the thing which brought about a declaration of war on the part of England and France against Germany had not yet occurred. Nobody then dreamed that Russia was going to invade Finland; but in order to encourage and facilitate the exportation of our own products, independent of any foreign country or any foreign need, with no Russia-Finland trouble in the minds of the Congress, the Export-Import Bank, or the administration, we were asked to increase the capital stock by $100,000,000. We increased it by $75,000,000 here in the Senate, but because it was involved in other legislation the House did not act on it.

I have no way of knowing whether or not Finland will obtain a loan out of the extra $100,000,000. I have no way of knowing whether Norway, Sweden, or China will obtain a loan out of the extra $100,000,000. But even if China receives not a dollar more; even if Finland receives not a dollar more; even if Norway and Sweden receive not a dollar more—which they may do under this legislation—we still need the $100,000,000 additional in the capital of the bank in order to facilitate the exportation of American products.

Mr. President, we are trying to cultivate our trade with all the Western Hemisphere. We are trying to build up our commerce with South America and Central America. Germany and other European nations have been able to occupy a large portion of the logical market for American products by advancing credit, and by a sort of barter and exchange system with South and Central America. During the 4 months in which England, France, and Germany have been at war the South American and Central American countries have been compelled to buy an increased number of products from the United States; and we have before us an opportunity to cultivate our export trade with South America and Central America, not merely during the existence of this war, but if we have any vision or foresight, and are willing to deal intelligently with our opportunity now, we can, with mutual benefit, gain this market for our commerce—both industrial and agricultural—long after this war has ended. Therefore, from the standpoint of our own industry and our own exports, regardless of any foreign war, we are justified in increasing the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. President, we are told that if we make a loan out of this fund to some American corporation for the benefit of Finland, China, Norway, or Sweden, we are taking a step toward war. One of the reasons why not only the Banking and Currency Committee but the Committee on Foreign Relations endorsed the substitute was that it was not in violation of international law, whereas the original bill might be. Therefore, we felt that it was a better form in which to pursue the legislation.

How can a loan of $10,000,000 more to Finland take us into war? How can a loan of $20,000,000 more for the benefit of China take us into war? There is no private stake thus created in the war's result.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am sorry, but I have not the time. I have only 2 minutes remaining. Otherwise I should gladly yield to my friend.

The nations of Europe owe us more than $12,000,000,000, which they have not paid, and may never pay; but we have not gone to war with any nation in Europe in order to collect the $12,000,000,000, and we are not going to war with any nation in Europe for that purpose if we never collect it. If we have not been willing to go to war with the nations of Europe to collect $12,000,000,000, can anybody imagine that we are going to war against Finland to collect $20,000,000 or $30,000,000, or that we are going to war against China to collect $25,000,000, plus $20,000,000, making $45,000,000; or that we are going to war against any nation which may, indirectly or directly, obtain some of this money, in order that we may collect it, and that, therefore, we are on the road to war?

Mr. President, I agree with those who have said that there may be special circumstances existing on account of our relationship with the little Republic of Finland. I have been unwilling to make our sympathy mercenary. I have been unwilling to say that we are going to lend money to Finland merely because she has paid back what she owed to us, in comparison with nations which have never owed us anything and therefore have had no opportunity to establish a character of credit.

However, as between Finland and any other nation which has borrowed money from us or has not borrowed money, I am willing to say that if Finland needs another loan of $10,000,000 or $20,000,000, and the conditions prescribed by the Export-Import Bank are met by Finland, I am in favor of her obtaining the money for the things which she needs which are not military supplies, but which she may sorely need for her gallant fight for self-preservation.

Much as I sympathize with Finland, I would not vote for a bill which would authorize a direct loan out of the Treasury of the United States to the Government of Finland for the specific purpose of buying war materials, because I think that would very largely infringe upon our neutrality.

This bill will help Finland. No other nation can complain at the form of this help.

I hope the amendments will be defeated and that the bill will be passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will state that the unanimous-consent agreement which has been entered into reads as follows:

That, beginning at 3 o'clock p. m. on Tuesday, February 13, 1940, no Senator shall speak more than once, nor longer than 20 minutes, on the bill S. 3069, a bill to provide certain loans to the Republic of Finland by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or any amendment thereto, and at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. the Senate proceed to vote without further debate on said bill and all amendments thereto.

The pending amendment is the one offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER], which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. After the words "loans to", it is proposed to strike out "any one foreign country"; and after the word "agencies", where it twice occurs, it is proposed to insert "of any one foreign country"; and after the words "made to", it is proposed to strike out "such foreign country and."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DANAHER. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I sent to the desk earlier in the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the amendment is stated and acted on, let the Chair state the parliamentary situation.

On the request of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BROWN] on Friday, by unanimous consent, the bill as reported out by the Banking and Currency Committee, and as reported by the Foreign Relations Committee and amended, was considered and agreed to be the bill before the Senate. In those circumstances the amendments of the committee will be understood to have been adopted without further vote. Under that unanimous-consent agreement, the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In line 12, it is proposed to strike out "$200,000,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$150,000,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT and Mr. McNARY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I understand that if he were present, he would vote on this question as I would vote. I therefore am at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

The Senators from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON and Mr. ELLENDER], the Senators from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS and Mr. SLATTERY], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained on important public business.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 of the act approved January 31, 1935 (49 Stat. 4), as amended, is amended (1) by striking out "$100,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$200,000,000"; and (2) by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans to any one foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof which are hereafter authorized to be made and are outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $20,000,000, and such amount shall be in addition to the amount of loans heretofore authorized or made to such foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof: Provided further, That the Export-Import Bank of Washington shall not make any loans in violation of international law as interpreted by the Department of State or for the purchase of any articles listed as arms, ammunition, or implements of war by the President of the United States in accordance with the Neutrality Act of 1939."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent, the title of the bill as reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency is amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and for other purposes."

ORDER FOR LEAVE TO COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO REPORT DURING ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during any adjournment of the Senate following the conclusion of business today the Committee on Appropriations may be authorized to make reports it may be prepared to present on any proposed legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PAYMENT OF INCOME TAX IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I report favorably from the Committee on the District of Columbia, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 8237) to amend the District of Columbia Revenue Act of 1939, which has passed the House of Representatives unanimously. The bill provides that the income tax which has been levied in the District of Columbia may be paid in two installments, instead of one, and the bill also exempts from inclusion under gross-income payments of benefits under laws relating to veterans. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 8237) to amend the District of Columbia Revenue Act of 1939 was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 18 of title II of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved July 26, 1939, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. All returns of income for the preceding taxable year shall be made to the assessor on or before the 15th day of April in each year, except that such returns, if made on the basis of a fiscal year shall be made on or before the 15th day of the fourth month following the close of such fiscal year, unless such fiscal year has expired in the calendar year 1939 prior to the approval of this act, in which event returns shall be made on or before the 15th day of the third month following the approval of this act."

SEC. 2. Subsection (a) of section 26 of title II of said act approved July 26, 1939, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 26. (a) Time of payment: One-half of the total amount of the tax imposed by this title shall be paid on the 15th day of April following the close of the calendar year and the remaining one-half of the tax shall be paid on the 15th day of October following the close of the calendar year, or, if the return be made on the basis of a fiscal year, then one-half of the total amount of the tax imposed by this title shall be paid on the 15th day of the fourth month following the close of the fiscal year and the remaining one-half of said tax shall be paid on the 15th day of the tenth month following the close of the fiscal year, except a fiscal year which expired in the calendar year 1939 prior to the approval of this act, in which event the tax shall be paid on the 15th day of the third month following the approval of this act."

SEC. 3. Title VI of said act approved July 26, 1939, is hereby amended by striking out "June 30, 1940" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "June 30, 1942."

SEC. 4. Section 4 (c) of such act (relating to exclusions from gross income) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(10) Payments of benefits made to or on account of a beneficiary under any of the laws relating to veterans."

T. N. E. C. HEARING ON FARM MORTGAGES HELD BY LIFE-INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I venture to call the attention of Senators who may be interested in the farm problem to the fact that during the next 2 or 3 days testimony will be presented at the hearings of the Temporary National Economic Committee which they will probably find of great significance. The committee is now studying the investments of the 26 largest life-insurance companies in farm mortgages.

I desire only briefly to mention some of the facts which are being developed. Farm mortgages held by life-insurance companies in 1929 had reached a total far in excess of $2,000,000,000. Thereafter they began to fall off, until in 1938 the total of farm mortgages held by life-insurance companies amounted to $895,000,000.

While this decrease in the amount of farm mortgages held by life-insurance companies was taking place, there was a corresponding increase in the amount held by the Federal land banks and under the Farm Credit Administration through commissioner's loans. These Federal land-bank mortgages in 1929 amounted to $1,183,000,000. In 1932 they amounted to $1,152,000,000. They have since been steadily increasing until in 1938 they amounted to $2,836,000,000.

Thus while life-insurance investment in farm mortgages has been declining, the Government investment through the Farm Credit Administration has been steadily increasing.

There is another significant fact. While the total amount of farm mortgages held by the life-insurance companies has been decreasing, the number of foreclosures has been increasing, and the value of farm lands now held by life-insurance companies is the highest in the history of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The statement of the Senator confuses me a little. Sometimes, as I understand, the Senator refers to mortgages as being held by life-insurance companies, and at other times he does not speak of the companies as life-insurance companies; he simply says "insurance companies."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I meant to use the term "life-insurance companies" in each instance.

Mr. NORRIS. In all instances the Senator refers to life-insurance companies?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. We are dealing only with life-insurance companies.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has given us no statistics in regard to any other kind of insurance companies except life-insurance companies?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No. This statement deals solely with the holdings of the 26 largest life-insurance companies.

Mr. NORRIS. That makes the statement plain.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will add this item: In 1929 these 26 companies owned approximately $81,000,000 worth of farm real estate. In 1932 the value of farm lands in life-insurance company ownership had increased to $235,000,000. In 1938 it had increased to $529,392,000. In other words, these 26 largest life-insurance companies now own outright considerably in excess of one-half billion dollars in farm real estate throughout the United States. That this is a problem of the first magnitude is obvious.

I have taken the liberty of calling this matter to the attention of the Senate because I know that many Members of this body, particularly those from farm States, will not only be interested in the information which is being developed but some may desire to be present during the hearings.

It goes without saying that I have recited these figures without in any sense even intimating any criticism of the life-insurance companies. It is not the fault of the companies that they have become the largest farm owners in the country. The objective of the study by the T. N. E. C. with respect to life-insurance companies has been primarily to develop information with respect to the investments of those companies.

Mr. WAGNER. And there is no question about the soundness of the policies.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; there is no question about the soundness of the policies. That statement, I will say to the Senator from New York, has been made and reiterated again and again.

The hearings are taking place in the caucus room in the Senate Office Building. Inasmuch as we are apparently to have an adjournment until Thursday, Senators may find it convenient to attend. They will be welcome.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

PROMOTION IN THE REGULAR ARMY

Capt. Charles Carlton, Infantry, to be major from December 16, 1939.

NOTE.—Captain Carlton was nominated January 4, 1940, and confirmed January 16, 1940, with rank from December 17, 1939. This message is submitted for the purpose of correcting an error in his date of rank, as a supplementary report of death of Maj. Francis G. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RAYBURN.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our most merciful Father, out of the depths from which spring humility, reverence, and faith do we appeal unto Thee for guidance and help. We pray that we shall receive such a portion of Thy spirit that we may be faithful and just in the daily duties of life; we rejoice that the Almighty One is a sun that shines on cabin and palace. Oh, give us the power of that faith to declare that the time will come when the nation that breaks its promises and sows to the wind shall of that wind reap the whirlwind; the blessed Lord help us to take no counsel of crouching fear, for with Thee a thousand years are as a day. O my soul, let us believe that self-discipline is the most stable form of character building and that the golden words of liberty, opportunity, and integrity will be the watchwords not only for our Republic but for the nations of earth. In the name of our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent Mr. BOLAND and Mr. LUDLOW were granted permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after disposition of business on the Speaker's table and the business of the day, I may address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks by inserting in the RECORD a letter I have received from Acting Secretary of the Treasury Bell, in answer to a speech made on the floor of the House by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] on February 6.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MERIT SYSTEM FOR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, last week this body considered and passed the so-called civil-service bill.

During debate while that bill was being considered we heard much about the merit system, much about the obligation of the Government to its employees, much about the humanitarianism of government.

Soon the United States Government is to start taking the decennial census. Applications are already being taken for some 250,000 to 275,000 temporary employees to take this census. Already these jobs are being promised to party workers and local politicians. Many of these political appointments have already been made.

In contrast to this, some 10,000,000 Americans are still out of employment. Made-work registers are still filled with names of needy persons awaiting their turn to work for the Government. Relief lists are still filled with the names of those who would do an honest day's work but cannot, so they must depend upon public assistance.

At the last session of this Congress I introduced a bill—H. R. 7148—providing that all temporary employees hired to take the 1940 census, excepting those under civil service and veterans' preference, be taken from the rolls of those certified as being in need of public assistance or made work. Today that bill remains pigeonholed in the rooms of the Committee on the Census.

Along with the hopes and ambitions and desires for work of millions of Americans it lies buried, while 250,000 jobs are being handed out to political satellites in preparation for the elections this fall.

Certainly there are people on the public-relief rolls today who are qualified to take this census. It does not require any great ability or special training to ask the housewife whether she shares her bathroom with others or uses it alone. Certainly it does not require any political training to qualify for asking the questions required by the Bureau of the Census.

It may take some expert talking to persuade Americans that they must divulge to some local politicians the amount of salary or wages they made last year or the number of weeks worked in 1939. It may require considerable argument to persuade Americans that such questions are not an invasion of their rights, but it should not require any special ability or training to write down the answers if the answer is given.

I know there are thousands of persons on the relief rolls who are just as well qualified to ask those questions as are the political appointees who are being promised those jobs.

For this Congress to sit here and calmly give its consent to keeping nine or ten million American citizens on the relief rolls and then passing out some 250,000 jobs to politicial friends for political purposes is not justice. It is not humanitarian. It is not the American way of doing things. And neither is it good business nor economical government.

Hundreds of other cities and villages are in the same position as my district. Relief loads have grown so heavy that local government is facing bankruptcy. Bond limits have been reached. Taxpayers are unable to pay their taxes.

Yet here we have the spectacle of the American Government handing out a quarter of a million jobs on a basis of political reward while 10,000,000 needy Americans still hunt for work.

Last week we voted to extend civil service to between 250,000 and 300,000 employees of the Government. I voted for that bill because I believe in merit and justice.

For the same reason, I ask the Members of this House to demand consideration of this bill, which would offer 250,000 jobs in the 1940 census to those Americans who need them. Let us not be just and humanitarian only where it will help politically; let us be just and humanitarian where it will help restore the self-respect of Americans who are anxious to work. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and include an address I delivered last night at Parkersburg, W. Va.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a short editorial from the Palasadian.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

NATIONAL YOUTH CONGRESS

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I believe that Members of Congress should be deeply concerned over the events that have transpired as the result of a recent convention of the National Youth Congress in the Nation's Capital.

We read with mixed emotions that the President of the United States and the First Lady were both hissed and booed when they addressed the convention and asked the assembled young people to think twice before committing themselves on problems of national and international importance. Yesterday we witnessed Members of the House of Representatives being derided here on the floor by young men and women of the youth organization who were assembled in the galleries. These manifestations that were in such poor taste can be ignored as bad manners, but there is an underlying factor involved which cannot be so easily disregarded.

A great many of the young persons who attended the convention are not yet mature enough to think things through for themselves. Where, then, are they having instilled in their minds such ideas of disrespect for the duly elected representatives of the United States? Where are they absorbing the philosophy that their only hope for the future lies in coming to Washington and lobbying for a hand-out of half a billion dollars? We Members of Congress should concern ourselves with this problem, which is immediate and pressing, and try to find the solution.

I do not believe that any of us can be justly accused of not having the future welfare of American youth at heart. Most of us are raising children of our own and I am sure that most of us are doing our best to train them in the true traditions of real Americanism. We hope that our children will learn to follow the principles of constitutional government as laid down by Washington and preserved by Lincoln. We hope that they will learn the proper respect for the constituted authorities and representatives of our democracy.

Jobs for young Americans are perhaps our primary consideration, if we do not want our youth to grow into manhood and womanhood expecting the Government to meet their every demand for assistance. Self-reliance and the ability to create and seize upon opportunity have made this Nation great, and these fundamental principles must be continued.

Let us concern ourselves with those individuals and organizations who are preaching un-American doctrines. We should resolve here and now that we will seek out and destroy the underlying causes for the undemocratic tendencies that are being drilled into some of the youth movements throughout the country. After all, the young people of today are the citizens of tomorrow, and they must be prepared to take over the reins of government when we relinquish our duties. I fervently hope that they will be prepared to meet their responsibility in traditional American style. [Applause.]

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by a fellow-townsman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KEEFE asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

THE 1940 CENSUS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. YOUNGDAHL], on his suggestion to change the method of appointing census enumerators, and have the enumerators selected from the relief rolls, I want to say that such a proposition is out of the question. It never has been done and it will not be done this time.

What the Bureau of the Census is trying to do is to select men and women in the various communities through a special test and get enumerators who are qualified to take the census, as the regulations provide.

Taking the census is not a guessing contest. The reports of the Census Bureau are supposed to be accurate, and what we are trying to do is to get a correct census of all the people of the United States. The machinery has already been set up and arrangements have been made for special examinations for these enumerators. They are to be selected in this way in every congressional district in the United States.

If the gentleman wants to come before the Census Committee, of which I am a member, I assure him we shall be glad to hear him; but the idea of coming before the House and demanding that we select all these enumerators from relief rolls to me is ridiculous.

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. If I have time, I yield for a brief question.

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Does the gentleman recall that an appearance was made before the Committee of the Census last spring in which some of us asked that there be a hearing on this matter, that the Director of the Census be called and also the Director of the W. P. A. to discuss this matter?

Mr. RANKIN. Was not that the time the gentleman from Minnesota appeared?

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. The members of the committee did not take it seriously enough to comply with that request, because they thought it was unreasonable.

These criticisms of the Bureau of the Census are unjust. I note, for instance, that objections have been raised to the inclusion of a question in this year's census of population concerning how much wages or salary each person made last year. This has been called an invasion of people's privacy and a violation of individual rights.

Many times, during the 150 years that the census has been the fact-finder of the Nation, much more searchingly personal questions have been asked by its enumerators. And the American people have answered these questions, not because it is a misdemeanor to refuse but because they have confidence in the census, what it stands for, and its long, fine record of keeping the answers confidential.

FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS IS THE TOP

Most of the complaints about this question of earnings—and they have been few—seem to be based upon a complete misconception, because most of them come from people who make very substantial salaries and who do not wish to report these salaries to the local census enumerators.

Therefore, most of the complaints are withdrawn when the ones who made them are informed that the ceiling on this question is $5,000, and that any person making more than that simply states, "over $5,000."

This is because the purpose of the question is to determine mass buying power for the purchase of consumption of goods, and incomes above $5,000 seldom are so expended. This purpose is the basis for the popular support of this question: To determine the extent of mass buying power in the field of consumption goods. That is an aim understood by every businessman in the country, every manufacturer, wholesaler, and retailer.

The question on earnings is said to be "personal," even though every census worker is sworn to secrecy under penalty of $1,000 fine and 2 years' imprisonment if he reveals a single fact he learns in line of duty, and even though a century and a half of census experience proves that census confidences are preserved.

HOW QUESTIONS ARE CHOSEN

Far more revealing questions have been asked, successfully, by the census in the past. Would it be too personal to require every adult to tell the census taker the value of all the real estate he owns, and the value of all the other property in his estate? Half of that was required 90 years ago, in 1850, under President Zachary Taylor; and all of it was required in 1860 and 1870, under President Buchanan and President Grant.

Who wants these statistical averages of the wages and salary of the American people? That is the crux of the whole question. A sample cross-section of the public demand for this question is easily obtainable from the Census Bureau and might surprise many people.

To begin with, the Census Bureau does not think up questions with which to annoy people. It is deluged before every census with thousands of questions which all sorts of responsible groups want it to ask. And it calls together, in a truly democratic way the leaders of the most important interested groups to help it sift these questions down to the minimum number of basically important questions.

WHO WANTS TO KNOW?

For 2 days, almost a year ago, it had in conference here in Washington more than 50 leaders in business, manufacturing, labor, government, together with statistical experts. That was on March 3 and 4, 1939. They were called here by Secretary Hopkins to discuss this very question of salary, and others like it, for the 1940 census.

Here is what the proceedings of that conference say:

Satisfaction was expressed particularly with the inquiries relating to migration, employment, unemployment, and economic status.

It should be borne in mind that this refers to the very material on wages and salaries, as well as other incomes, which is still on the question list for the 1940 census.

Now, who attended that conference? Here are only a few: Dr. Louis Dublin, of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.; Dr. David R. Craig, president of the American Retail Federation; Mr. Noel Sargent, secretary of the National Association of Manufacturers; Gen. Robert E. Wood, chairman of Sears, Roebuck; Sidney R. Katz, of the C. I. O.; and Miss Margaret Scattergood, of the A. F. of L.; and Dr. Stacy May, of the Rockefeller Foundation. This is just a few of the people in this conference who saw nothing wrong with this question. They largely represent the very ones who will have to answer these questions—both labor and capital.

WIDE RANGE OF REQUESTS

Who else believes that this question is in the public interest?

In the cross-section of requests for statistics on earnings of the American people are letters and resolutions from the American Home Economics Association, the National Industrial Conference Board, the Actuarial Society of America, the Population Association of America, from ministers and church councils, Y. M. C. A.'s, insurance companies, automobile manufacturers, public utilities, labor unions, advertising agencies and market analysts, publishers such as Senator CAPPER and Meredith and McFadden and the Associated Farm Papers. There are even requests from two Representatives and one Senator.

"STRONGLY RECOMMENDED"

One of these requests came from a conference sponsored by the National Bureau of Economic Research, which includes directors from such groups as the American Engineering Council, the American Management Association, the National Publishers Association, and the American Federation of Labor. I want to quote you what this conference reported to the Secretary of Commerce:

The conference went on record as strongly recommending the inclusion of such questions (questions on income) in the (1940) census.

It also should be remembered that this income question was approved unanimously by the advisory committee to the Census Bureau, composed of Dr. Robert E. Chaddock, of Columbia University; Dr. J. Frederick Dewhurst, of the Twentieth Century Fund; Mr. Paul T. Cherington, market analyst; Dr. William F. Ogburn, of the University of Chicago; Dr. Murray R. Benedict, of the University of California; and Dr. Willard R. Thorp, of Dun & Bradstreet.

This information is not to be used to air the private affairs of the individual, any more than in his income-tax returns. But it is for the purpose of compiling statistics that will be of value to all the American people.

I trust members will desist from unnecessary criticisms of the Bureau of the Census, and join us in helping to make the 1940 census a success.

It is a matter in which all our people are interested, and the Bureau is entitled to the moral as well as the official support of every Member of both Houses of Congress.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Minnesota is absolutely right in his attempt to call to the attention of the House the fact that Minnesota is being discriminated against in connection with its unemployment relief problem as far as the Federal Government is concerned. Thousands of people in our State have been certified for W. P. A., yet they are lying around starving to death trying to get work, but denied work by the Administrator of the W. P. A. I call the attention of the House to the following news item taken from the Minneapolis Star-Journal of January 29:

CITY READIES PLEA FOR MORE JOBS ON W. P. A.—STOLTE TO RECEIVE WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE WEDNESDAY

Definite effort to obtain 1,000 to 2,500 more W. P. A. jobs for Minneapolis relief clients will be made by the city council ways and means committee Wednesday at a meeting with S. L. Stolte, State W. P. A. administrator.

The meeting was arranged today after Nathan Harris, city utilities engineer, told a joint session of the committee and the welfare board 2,712 relief clients are now awaiting W. P. A. assignment here, out of a total of 9,690 in the entire State.

Stolte had written the committee complaining the city is operating too many "white collar" W. P. A. projects, and that it should have more strictly labor projects.

Harris showed that Hennepin County now has 8,726 on W. P. A. jobs, or 18.8 percent of the State total of 46,528. Minneapolis' relief load now is 33.2 percent of the State's total load, Harris said, indicating the city is entitled to many more W. P. A. jobs than have been assigned here.

Reports showed the three largest W. P. A. projects now in operation here, including one of the city engineer, one of the park board, and the relief department's sewing project, were intended to employ 7,386 relief clients but total employed on these now is only 3,711.

Heads of the departments said they could give work to 2,000 or more relief clients on these projects if the workers were certified by W. P. A.

As you see, we have gone into this matter with the administrators, both Federal and State, but we seem to get nowhere. My colleague's contention that we have many people out there qualified to serve as census enumerators is correct. In Minneapolis alone there are 62,500 people on relief. If we cannot find someone out of that group of 62,500 qualified to serve as census enumerators then I miss my guess.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Even if we did take the enumerators from the relief rolls, it would simply cut down the number of people employed by the Government instead of increasing it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; it would.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not at all because we have many more people out there eligible to be placed on the W. P. A. rolls. What I understand the gentleman wants to suggest was to take those qualified relief people and appoint them as census enumerators instead of political appointments, such as the wife of a man already working, or the reverse.

Mr. RANKIN. No; he suggested that they be taken from the relief rolls.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to insert herewith a statistical report on the Minnesota W. P. A. situation as compared with the other States. You will note that Minneapolis and St. Paul rank 32 and 28, respectively, in the list of 41 largest cities:

UTILITIES ENGINEER,
Minneapolis, Minn., December 28, 1939.

Subject: Federal Aid to Cities Through W. P. A. Expenditures.

WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE,
Minneapolis, Minn.

GENTLEMEN: Attached hereto are two tables developed from a bulletin recently received in this office from the Social Security Board, Washington, D. C.

Table I discloses the total expenditure from public funds during the month of August 1939 for public relief in each of the 41 cities of the United States having a population of more than 200,000. For your further information the data for Duluth and Des Moines, each having a population of under 200,000, are also shown, inasmuch as these are the nearest larger urban centers not included in the regular list. Table I shows for each of these cities the population, total relief outlay, total W. P. A. earnings, and the percentage of total relief outlay in the form of W. P. A. earnings.

Table II rearranges the list of cities so as to show their rank order from a standpoint of the percentage of W. P. A. earnings in relation to total public-relief expense.

The figures for 1 month only may, of course, not be an adequate index of relative aid furnished by W. P. A. in the various urban centers, but it is significant, nevertheless, to note that for the month referred to 31 out of these 41 cities had a higher percentage of relief burden carried through W. P. A. expenditures than was the case in Minneapolis. Furthermore, the cities of Duluth and Des Moines likewise benefited by a higher percentage of their public-relief expense being carried through W. P. A. outlay than is the case in Minneapolis. You will further observe that the 3 cities having the highest percentage of Federal aid in this form were the southern cities of Atlanta, Birmingham, and New Orleans, each reporting more than 80 percent of their public-relief expense in the form of earnings of W. P. A. workers.

Minneapolis, with a 47.6 percent of public-relief expense in the form of W. P. A. earnings, ranks 32d in the list of 41 cities.

To what extent this disparity between the proportion of local relief expense borne by W. P. A. in the city of Minneapolis and the corresponding proportion in most of the other large cities of the United States is due to local policy on W. P. A. projects requiring skilled labor, or is due to Federal policy in allocating W. P. A. quotas, is not determined.

This data is being submitted merely for the purpose of giving your committee the benefit of the latest information we have on the subject.

Respectfully submitted.

NATHAN HARRIS, Utilities Engineer.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address by the minority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], which he delivered last night in connection with the Lincoln Day celebrations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by placing in the Appendix of the RECORD the testimony given by Mr. Coulter before the Ways and Means Committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE]?

There was no objection.

NAVY DEPARTMENT AND NAVAL SERVICE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. SCRUGHAM, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 8438) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 1587), which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DITTER reserved all points of order on the bill.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8438) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes; and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate may continue throughout the day, and that the time be equally divided between myself and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM]?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask if it is the intention to have Calendar Wednesday business on tomorrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair may say for the information of the gentleman that that is the intention. The Chair may say further, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN], which is a proper one, that previously we have been calling one committee on the calendar each Wednesday. The Committee on Indian Affairs may have several bills for consideration tomorrow. It may be that this will require until 2 or 3 o'clock. The Chair feels that it would not be quite fair to begin reading this bill tomorrow after the Committee on Indian Affairs has completed its work. Perhaps more time may be desired for general debate before reading the bill. The bill can be read for amendment on Thursday and Friday, as we have nothing else on the calendar this week.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will there be any objection to continuing debate on the naval appropriation bill after the completion of the Calendar Wednesday business, if time remains?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the suggestion made by the Chair, although no request has been made to that effect.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that this measure and the hearings thereon have not been made available to the Members of the House until today, which I think is bad practice.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand, it is the intention and has been the intention of the chairman of the subcommittee and the acting chairman of the full committee that this bill be read for amendment on Thursday, and not before then. That has been the intention right along. Is that correct?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. That is correct.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is mistaken with reference to the time for reading the bill. It was my understanding with the chairman of the subcommittee that the bill would be read on Friday, that we would not start reading the bill until Friday. If I am in error I should like to know that at this time.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. That depends upon the amount of time required for general debate.

Mr. DITTER. May we have the assurance that the bill will not be read for amendment until Friday?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Personally I have no objection.

Mr. DITTER. Then can we come to an agreement on that at this time?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. So far as the chairman of the subcommittee is concerned, the agreement is all right with me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM] that general debate continue throughout the day?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of H. R. 8438.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8438, with Mr. BLAND in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, it is with a feeling of some serious responsibility that I present this major appropriation bill to the House. My colleagues on the Committee, Mr. FERNANDEZ, Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts, Mr. CALDWELL, Mr. DITTER, Mr. PLUMLEY, and Mr. MCLEOD, and myself, assisted by our efficient clerical staff, have spent many weeks on the hearings and in painstaking study of a large amount of pertinent economic and military data. We have been ably aided in every way in our hearings and studies by the personnel of the Navy Department who were assigned for the purpose.

The committee, in recognition of the superior economic strength of the United States, believes that a high obligation rests on the Nation to command the utmost means for its just defense. Civilization itself may be at stake. As a fundamental matter of national policy the committee further believes that in recommending appropriations for new capital ships that their size, speed, and armament should not be limited by principles of parity with other nations but that they should be made superior to any existing or pending construction insofar as this is practicable.

The naval appropriation bill for 1941 totals the sum of $966,772,878, a reduction of $111,700,000 below the Budget estimate. This figure sets a new record for peacetime proposals, exceeding the total appropriations for the current year by some $51,000,000. This constitutes an increase of 5½ percent over the appropriations for the current fiscal year.

In justification of this vast expenditure, the first question that naturally arises is, "Whom are we going to fight?" The answer is, "Nobody, if the proper preparation is made and a strong, definite policy of defense is adopted."

Powerful currents of emotional opinion are today running against this policy in America; nevertheless, we cannot allow emotional opinion to be a basic influence in the making of defense appropriations. We are told that democracy is in danger. It certainly will be endangered by war. We must defend democracy by opposing war, unless forced upon us by the absolute necessity of defending the American Continent. It is well to now inquire into the proper limits of this defense.

The continental defense boundary was originally designed to be 3 miles from the shore line, this being the range of effectiveness of the best cannon of the time. In November 1793 Thomas Jefferson, then Secretary of State, informed the British Ambassador and also the French Ambassador that the President had instructed all officers under his direction, "that waters within our 3-mile limit were considered to be under the jurisdiction of the United States," but he specifically reserved the ultimate extent of our jurisdiction for future deliberations. The 3-mile limit is now certainly obsolete. Considerable testimony on the subject can be found in the hearings. It has evidently always been a definite national policy of Great Britain to leave her sea boundaries undetermined. By leaving them vague and ambiguous, the pretension to maritime sovereignty could be advanced and used as a political instrument when needed, and then relegated to the background without tarnishing the national honor.

The United States suffers from no such a situation. In my opinion, a delineation of the line of our responsibility is much needed, and the subcommittee commends the matter to the attention of the State Department. The continental shelf is suggested as such a line, as it bounds the source of nearly all of our sea-food supplies.

Basically, the present unsettled condition of world affairs, as well as the uncertainties facing our own Government, are essentially phases of the age-old and eternal struggle between the haves and have-nots. This never-ending contest happens to be in one of its most acute cycles.

Internationally the only ultimate adjustment seems to be through force of arms. The economic root underlying the vast expenditures and preparations for war, is the worldwide demand for supplies of natural resources which modern civilization requires for national industrial prosperity.

This country is the richest in the world in the majority of these natural resources, as well as the richest in variety and quantity of food products. With only 7 percent of the world's population and 6 percent of the world's area we own or control nearly one-half of the world's raw materials. The United States cannot avoid the issue. It is part of our domain that is ultimately at stake. The United States is the world's largest producer, largest consumer, and largest distributor of these raw materials. Any approach to equalization with other nations means a shift of sovereignty on an unthinkable scale. Four-fifths of the world's industrial power lies on an axis extending in a comparatively narrow belt from Chicago eastward through central England and west central Europe, and most of the mineral resources of the world are tributary to this axis. The rulership of the world lies in the control of this industrial axis.

Before presenting the detailed naval estimates for the fiscal year 1941, I will further review briefly the background of events antecedent to this Budget.

In effect, let us step back until we can see the forest as distinguished from the trees. A longer view than political expediency is very necessary in considering this naval bill. From 1920 to June 30, 1936, the United States, in conformity with treaty obligations to its Allies of the last World War, Great Britain, France, Japan, and Italy, and under the terms of the naval treaties of Washington, 1922, and London, 1930, proceeded to maintain its naval position on a parity with Great Britain, on a 5–3 ratio with Japan, and on a 5–1.75 with France and Italy. In addition, the United States made certain political commitments in the Washington Treaty of 1922, which, in effect, permitted the other signatories already established in the Far East to fortify their positions therein, but, in the case of the United States, this right was relinquished during the life of the treaty. This concession, in retrospect futile and unnecessary, impaired our political position as an advocate of the open door in China and as being insistent upon equal trading rights in the area. It may be that it is in part responsible for the plight of China today.

It is well to remember that these decisions and commitments were made in the light of and closely after the end of the World War and upon the formation of the League of Nations. Internal politics at home played some part in the consummation of this political pact. Political leaders of the major parties in this country were unctuously bidding for the role of being the righteous, charitable, and bountiful doer of good deeds abroad with Government money and credit. The goose was hanging high, we were back to normalcy, the boom was on, why worry about the things that lay in the future?

But time marches on; the decade passed swiftly by, and in its wake, and due to the mistakes of the bountiful era, we now face the realities and the hardpan of the present.

Events have shown that, while the military and naval commitments of the past war treaties may have been well advised, only a hardy politician would dare to affirm the commitments of the Versailles Treaty or the Washington Treaty were well considered or that their consequences have eased the problems of the United States or any other nation in either international relations or in world trade. Commencing late in 1929, we began to produce a considerable surplus of cotton, oil, tobacco, corn, wheat, minerals, machinery, electrical devices and appliances, motor cars, tools, and textiles, and other things. There needs to be developed a market to consume these surpluses and, with foreign selling, there must be an exchange of money or goods. In the long run, there must be even a parity in all trade balance if the customer is to remain solvent. If there is an unfavorable trade balance with the buyer, there must be loans or capital furnished him from some source. To continue business we have found that loans to be profitable as an investment and paid at maturity must have adequate security.

The situation in Europe today has taught us that there also must be security for the very privilege of continuing national effort to profitably dispose of surpluses.

It is in the implications of this statement that we should view the Navy bill, and not in the political expediency of an election year.

Today many millions of people, including those of Italy, Germany, Japan, and even the Soviets, are governed by dictatorships. Aggression and conquest of weaker nations and seizure of their resources is as natural an expression of autocracy as the stalking of prey for food by predatory animals. Human history contains continuous record of such performances. The organization and employment of armies for effecting conquests appeals strongly to national pride and accustoms a people to severe regimentation, on the pretext of temporary necessity, while providing armed forces they cannot resist when later employed against them in suppression of domestic opposition. The law of survival of the fittest continues to rule the affairs of man, notwithstanding his efforts to raise himself above conditions which nature imposes on all living things.

Proposals for disarmament conferences and economic appeasements to stop war appear to be absolutely useless under present world conditions. The autocracies which have subordinated the individual to national needs cannot in any way subordinate themselves to foreign interests. Therein lies the element of greatest danger of destruction to civilization.

Events are taking place so rapidly that their implications are unpredictable. To review them: In 1931 Japan seizes Manchukuo; in 1934 Hitler seizes power, Germany rearms. In 1934 the Spanish revolution occurs, followed by civil war. In 1935 Mussolini's undeclared war in Abysinnia commences. In 1937 Japan's undeclared war in China takes the center of the stage. In 1938 Germany occupies Austria, then Czechoslovakia. In 1939 is the occupation and partition of Poland. Then Great Britain and France declare war with Germany. Russia exerts military control of the smaller Baltic states and in November 1939 invades Finland. A 5-year period of bloody struggles. It is well to bear in mind that every great power in the world, except the United States, is or has been at war in the last 5 years, and this year may see every power in Europe at war. There is no place for weakness in the totalitarian concept. Force is the only arbiter and the only court of appeal. In totalitarian theory, the seats in which you now sit are no more secure than your military power to defend them.

There is another type of reasoning often advanced in this Chamber. It is the one designed to create dissension and to oppose the interests of one group, class, or section to another. The subject of national defense cannot be viewed as a sectional matter. The support of the Navy is not the responsibility or of interest to the coastal population alone. I wish to emphasize that voting for the Navy bill is not voting against the laborer or farmer but for him. Labor and industry especially have always known and understood this fact. The labor group, organized and informed, has nearly always stood for national defense without regard to the party in power. The depression, if it has done nothing else, should enable the farmer to see that even the disposal of farm surpluses depends on markets and trade, and trade itself, in large measure, depends on the ability to hold our own when necessary in the field of world affairs.

Insofar as appropriations are concerned, the cut in the agricultural budget was relatively no more severe than the proposed cut in the naval budget. The Navy bill before you is not a product of militarism but a byproduct of the unrest in international affairs. It represents the concerted intelligent efforts of a bipartisan Appropriations Committee to preserve the mighty resources of our Nation and to keep the United States out of war.

Up to this year we have been engaged in an orderly building program designed to maintain our relative position as a world power. Under normal conditions our naval expense should have reached the peak by this time and then should have started to decrease had the war in Europe not broken out. As soon as the European war started the President strengthened the national defense by getting it ready for business and by asking for a revision of the Neutrality Act in the special session of Congress. Ordinary precautions were taken. I am certain that they have the support of the electorate and were designed to keep us from aggression by being ready for eventualities.

This appropriation bill is designed to fully protect the Nation in any contingencies which may be reasonably expected to arise. In the report which accompanies the measure as submitted a complete analysis of the bill is given. Important features may be listed as follows: Naval appropriations for fiscal year 1940 amounted to $915,360,249. Budget for 1941 was $1,078,472,577. The bill recommends for 1941, $966,772,878.

The summation excludes trust accounts amounting to $2,430,000, which become available automatically and which are listed on page 37 of the report.

The estimates proposed a total strength of 152,000 enlisted men in 1941, and the committee has given careful consideration to this matter. The emergency supplemental bill provided a strength of 145,000 for the current fiscal year to man the additional vessels which have been put in commission in connection with the neutrality patrol, and the bill as reported makes provision for 150,000 in 1941. One of the deficiencies in our national defense has always been in the number of available trained men, and it appears highly desirable that we should increase the present strength of the Navy in order to provide training for as many men as possible. If a real emergency should occur and we were required to man every vessel to the limit on short notice, these additional trained men would be worth a great deal more to us in that extremity than the cost in dollars to the pending appropriation. The bill provides for a normal enlisted personnel of 125,000 as against 116,000 in 1940. This is on account of the new ships under construction, which will be placed in service during 1941, and may be laid at the door of the Expansion Act passed by Congress a few years ago. The additional number of 25,000 men is on account of the need for additional men in the neutrality patrol.

The Marine Corps has been provided with the strength of 25,000 men, as contemplated in the Budget estimate and as provided in the 1940 Emergency Supplemental Act. Of this number, 20,000, or an increase of 1,000, are provided for the normal strength and the additional 5,000 are provided on account of the emergency.

The Expansion Act of 1938 authorized a minimum of 3,000 airplanes by 1944, and the Navy will have available by July 1 of this year 2,863 planes. The procurement of planes has been proceeding at a much more rapid rate than necessary to reach the 3,000 figure by 1944; and, as a matter of fact, had the Budget estimate been approved in full, the Navy would have had in service or on order by July 1, 1941, in excess of 3,100 planes. The bill before you carries provision for planes to replace all planes which will have reached an age and condition during the year 1941 as to render them unsuited as so-called program planes, and also includes provision for 47 expansion planes for the Naval Reserve. The amount requested for 224 expansion planes for the Regular Navy has been deleted from the bill for several reasons.

In the first place, the Navy has found it necessary to reduce the training time at the Pensacola station from 14 months to 7 months in order to provide pilots as rapidly as required. Your committee is not convinced that this was a wise step. The planes being purchased by the Navy cost from $60,000 to more than $200,000 each. Every time a pilot takes one of these planes in the air, he is responsible for a considerable investment of the Government, not to mention the fact that he is responsible for his own and the lives of other Navy personnel. The greatest care should be taken to assure an adequate supply of sufficiently trained competent pilots, and the committee does not propose to recommend the purchase of planes over and above the present number if the too rapid expansion of the air arm of the Navy must result in sending those planes aloft in the hands of too hastily trained men.

The second factor involved is the question of obsolescence. It is no secret that frequently the various air services have purchased quantities of planes known to be of the very latest design and carrying the latest improvements at the time contracted for, but which were actually obsolescent upon delivery on account of new developments made in the meantime. Aviation is a new industry and is yet in its infancy. What the future may bring forth in the way of new designs involving range of operation, speed, fighting ability, and so forth, is wholly unknown; and it would not be good business for us to purchase a large number of planes for which we have no present need when we more than likely would find it necessary to scrap them and replace them with newer types when the emergency presents itself. In other words, there is no emergency confronting us at the present time which would require us to expand our air force beyond training and peacetime needs, and we might better save our money to spend on more modern ships when the need for them is in sight.

To consider a third factor, let us look for a moment at the capacity of our manufacturing establishments. It has been argued in past years that we should place orders for planes in order to keep our manufacturing plants in operation and have them in shape to produce large numbers of planes on short notice if we should become involved in war. A different picture presents itself this year. Our factories are in receipt of orders for large numbers of planes from foreign governments who are engaged in actual warfare. We can, therefore, look to these orders to keep our plants in operation and provide any necessary expansion of them and save this expense.

AVIATION

While no provision is made in the bill for purchase of expansion planes for the Regular Navy, there is included the amount of $2,000,000 for purchase of planes in addition to the requirement for replacement and the 47 planes for expansion of the Naval Reserve strength. This amount is provided for the purchase of prototypes and other experimental craft, including those powered by Diesel motors. The war in Europe will no doubt result in many new developments in this field, and it is altogether possible that entirely new designs of aircraft will be produced. The Navy Department should have sufficient funds available to keep abreast of all new developments, and this $2,000,000 for purchase of experimental aircraft, coupled with the appropriation for research and experimentation in aviation, $7,500,000, ought to prove adequate for this purpose.

Autogiros and helicopters have never been extensively experimented with by the Navy. The Army is conducting experimentation with these two designs and is attempting to coordinate the work of all Government agencies in that field. No doubt there will be problems of a peculiarly naval aspect arise which the Navy should be equipped to investigate. Therefore in including the $2,000,000 for purchase of experimental craft the committee has stated in its report that it desires $50,000 of this money spent on autogiros and helicopters.

SHIP CONSTRUCTION

Another phase of this bill which is of general interest is the ship construction program, and this question has taken more of the time of the subcommittee than any other single question in the bill. We were confronted with the request for two additional battleships to be laid down in 1941 in addition to 22 smaller craft and for appropriations to continue work on 8 battleships and 89 smaller craft already under construction. The bill before you carries provision for all of these ships. The reductions which have been made by the committee and which are detailed in the report are based on a review of the requirements for carrying forward the program, and, in the judgment of the committee, these cuts will in no way impede progress of construction.

A major question considered by the committee was the type of capital ship to be constructed. Provision was made in the appropriation bill last year for two new capital ships, and it was contemplated that these ships would have a displacement of 45,000 tons. In reviewing this program in the light of later developments, the committee has inquired most minutely into the characteristics of these ships as compared with those of ships being built by other countries. It appears, from the best information we have been able to secure, that these ships are just about the equal of foreign construction. As expressed in the report, it is the view of the committee that the United States, considering its leading position in the family of nations and its economic resources, not only ought to have as a national-defense measure but is in a position to build capital ships definitely superior as to speed, armor, and armament to any ship which we might be called upon to face in warfare. While provision has been made in the bill for continuation of construction of the 2 ships originally appropriated for in the 1940 act and initial appropriations are included for 2 additional capital ships to be laid down in 1941, it is the desire of the committee, as expressed in the report accompanying the bill, that the Department restudy the plans which have been prepared for the 45,000-ton battleships with a view to adding sufficient armor and armament and to increasing the speed of these ships to make them markedly superior to any known possible foe. Of course, these additions must mean increased tonnage—and let me point out that there is now no limitation either by treaty or by statute on the total tonnage, or on the speed, or on the armor or the armament of any vessel. We can build, under all existing statutes and treaty obligations, any size ship we desire, and I speak not only for myself but for the committee, which, after long deliberation, has arrived at a definite conclusion, when I express the view that we are practically wasting our money if we build vessels no better than those provided to oppose us when the expenditure of a small additional amount would give us a superior ship.

CAPITAL SHIPS

In considering the total tonnage of capital ships, consideration must be given to the cruising radius which a ship must have in order to meet the needs of the nation building her. For instance, Great Britain has many bases strategically located throughout the world where she maintains large stocks of fuel oil, ammunition, and other necessary supplies, and it is therefore possible for Great Britain to reduce the cruising radius of her ships below that which would be required of a United States vessel to operate on the same plane. This is a highly important factor as it enables Great Britain to reduce the tonnage of a ship which is given over to the storage of fuel oil and other supplies and use that tonnage in armor and armament. Therefore, a British battleship displacing 45,000 tons can readily be a more powerful fighting unit than an American ship of the same displacement. She may also be a faster ship than an American vessel of comparable size by the utilization of a part of this additional tonnage for horsepower.

Let me call your attention to a statement in the hearings on S. 2193 in 1937 in regard to the characteristics of battleships:

GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS

The fighting strength of a battleship is a combination of offensive power and the power of survival.

The offensive power depends upon the number and caliber of the guns carried. Battleships carry the heaviest guns that are mounted on any type of ships. The heaviest gun carried by any battleship afloat is 16 inches, and on ships of the maximum permitted displacement it is not possible to mount more than 8 or 9 such guns.

No modern ship, other than a battleship, mounts a gun larger than 8 inches.

If the London Naval Treaty of 1936 is ratified the size of the largest gun on battleships will be limited to 14 inches caliber, provided Japan and Italy accept this caliber before April 1, 1937. Should they not agree to this, the limit of size of guns on battleships becomes 16 inches.

By power of survival is meant the ability of a battleship to sustain itself at sea for long periods and to remain afloat and effective even after having received considerable injury.

The maximum size of battleships has been limited in former treaties to 35,000 tons, standard displacement, and if the London Naval Treaty of 1936 is ratified, this limitation in size will continue.

Because of its size, a battleship is able to carry the heaviest armor on its sides and its turrets to keep out armor-piercing projectiles that may strike in direct or glancing flight, and heavy and adequate armored decks to deflect the glancing blows from plunging shells and to break up the thin cases of bombs dropped from planes, so that they will spend their force in the open and not penetrate into the vitals of the ship. Protection from torpedoes and mines is obtained by adequate subdivision of the hull into small watertight compartments and by an elaborate system of pumping and drainage.

Size alone is a protection to a ship. One projectile or a bomb, or a torpedo, can carry only a certain amount of explosive. When the missile explodes it will destroy that part of the ship which lies within a definite radius. Consequently, the larger the ship, the smaller the proportion of her that is damaged by one shot. To illustrate the point, let us assume that the explosive in a missile will destroy 1,000 tons of ship structure. If the missile, then, should hit a 1,000-ton destroyer or submarine, it would destroy it; if it were to hit a 10,000-ton cruiser, it would destroy one-tenth of it, and if the same missile should hit a 35,000-ton battleship it would destroy one thirty-fifth of her. In reality, the larger the ship, the tougher she is—she has besides armor, heavier plating generally, and greater ruggedness throughout. The Battle of Jutland, fought in 1916, shows how much punishment a battleship can take and still remain afloat.

There were 28 British battleships and 22 German battleships engaged in that battle. Only one battleship was sunk, the old German dreadnaught Pommern. She was of only 13,200 tons, laid down in 1904, and hence her design was 12 years old at the time. The other 24 ships that were sunk were battle cruisers, which were much more lightly armored than the battleships of that day, and cruisers, and destroyers.

The British battleship Warspite in that battle received more hits from heavy-caliber projectiles than any other battleship. She received 13 hits. The battle was fought on May 31 and the repairs were completed on July 20, 50 days.

The German battleship Koenig received more hits than any other German battleship. She received 10 hits from large projectiles and was repaired by August 3, 64 days. No other type could have possibly survived such punishment.

The effect of damage by gunfire and by torpedoes in the Battle of Jutland was carefully studied by all nations, and all battleships designed since that battle embody the lessons learned in that battle.

The degree of protection afforded to the vitals of the battleship by armor is indicated by the small number of men killed in the battleships. The total number of British killed was 6,097, but only 123, about 2 percent, were killed on battleships. The total number of Germans killed was 2,545. The battleships suffered 948 killed, of whom 840 were on the one old battleship which was sunk by a torpedo, leaving only 108 from the other battleships.

The great size of the modern battleship permits her to carry a large number of smaller rapid-fire guns for defense against destroyers and an effective and large battery of antiaircraft guns and machine guns for defense against aircraft. Her size makes her a steady gun platform.

The cruising radius is the greatest of any combatant type of vessel, and it is capable of the greatest degree of self maintenance. It is capable of giving battle in practically any state of the weather or sea.

There is another provision in the bill which the committee desires to call to the attention of the Congress. This is a provision preventing the expenditure of any money from the appropriation for construction of new ships on ships which have been in commission more than 12 months. The practice of the Department in years past has been to take ships back into the navy yards for alterations long after the ships have been commissioned, and charge such alterations to new construction. It is not illogical to require that there be some check by Congress on this practice. In other words, there should be some date when a ship may be considered as finished. Two years ago the Congress included a provision in the bill prohibiting obligation of funds for such work after 12 months had elapsed from the date of commission. The provision, as written, has been more or less ineffective, as evidenced by the fact that the estimates for 1941 include $5,522,521 for work on ships commissioned prior to July 1, 1939. The bill as presented carries the same provision in slightly amended form, prohibiting the expenditure of the appropriation for the construction of new ships for any work, including material, undertaken upon any ship more than 12 months after the ship has been commissioned. This provision is ultimately fair in that it allows the Navy 12 months from the time a ship is commissioned and taken out for trial runs to discover and rectify any errors in construction that may develop and to make any alterations necessary to provide a satisfactory ship.

RESEARCH LABORATORY

There is a real need for continued research and experimentation in naval problems, and the committee has increased the amount allowed for the Naval Research Laboratory $250,000 above the Budget. The small amount to be spent by this laboratory—about $650,000—will repay itself many times over in the new measures for national defense which will be developed by the laboratory. In years past this laboratory has contributed much to the developments in naval construction and armament and is at present working on a number of very important problems for which adequate funds should be provided. The expenditure of sufficient money for research and experimentation should also result in considerable saving to the Government by reducing costs.

RESERVE

The Naval Reserve has not had the attention and support in years past which its importance in the national-defense program warrants. The committee has gone very thoroughly into this question, and it is our considered judgment that we can well afford to spend larger amounts in training the Volunteer Reserve, and we have, therefore, increased the appropriation for this purpose $200,000 over the Budget. It will be noted that the Budget estimates include a considerable increase for the Naval Reserve, but this entire increase is to be applied to aviation, and it was the desire of the committee to provide additional training for the Volunteer Reserve, which would be called upon immediately in event of a threat of war. The policies of the War Department and the Navy Department with respect to the reserve forces have been directly opposite. The War Department has for a number of years encouraged and provided for a large Reserve army and has endeavored to keep that Reserve army adequately trained and sufficiently equipped to take its place in the battle line on short notice, whereas the Navy Department has not encouraged a large Reserve. As a matter of fact, the opinion has been expressed, and there appears to be some ground for it, that the Navy has actually discouraged expansion of the Reserve.

PUBLIC WORKS

The Budget estimates presented 55 new public-works projects to the Congress, and the committee has considered each of these items carefully, with a view to eliminating such as are not required or which might be deferred without serious consequences. There is no doubt that each of these projects would be well worth the cost and that each of them is needed by the Navy. However, faced with the necessity of reducing appropriations wherever possible, the committee has eliminated from the bill as reported all new projects which it appeared could be deferred for future consideration. This has resulted in a reduction of $7,395,750 in the appropriation for these new projects. In addition the committee has reduced by 5 percent—$1,800,775—the amount in the estimates for continuation of work on projects the construction of which was begun with prior appropriations. This cut will be applied by the Department.

One of the public-works items in the bill is a provision for improvement of harbors and channels in the fourteenth naval district at a total cost of $3,000,000, with a cash outlay for 1941 of $1,000,000. This work is proposed for the island of Guam. The work is necessary on account of increased air travel across the Pacific Ocean, as it is absolutely essential that American commercial planes make a stop at Guam, which is the only port of call open to American ships between Midway and Wake Islands and the Philippines, a distance of over 3,000 miles. The harbor at Guam has a number of coral heads, which should be removed in order to allow airplanes to land safely. In addition the harbor is frequently rough on account of swells coming in from the open sea, and a breakwater across the entrance to the harbor is necessary to provide a suitable landing area.

The bill as reported also includes provision for improvement of present water supply on the island at a total cost of $325,000, of which $125,000 is provided for in 1941. An urgent need for this water supply has been shown to exist, as at certain seasons of the year water rationing must be resorted to.

It has been claimed that any improvement in Guam will be taken as a hostile gesture by the nations in Asia particularly. I can see no such reason whatever. Guam is the property of the United States and has been administered by the Navy. Any improvements made there should properly and logically and economically be made by the Navy. The proposed improvements are only those things that are necessary to provide for the safe landing of our airplanes. The committee felt it would be taking a grave responsibility on its shoulders if it refused to vote for the appropriation for making this harbor safe and there should be an accident involving the loss of even a single life.

Mr. Chairman, I have attempted to cover only the more important phases of this measure in the few minutes at my disposal. Detailed information as to the various items has been included in the report which the committee has submitted with the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman has stated that the committee could find in the report an explanation with regard to the reduction in the appropriation. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to page 10 of the report. I have not had time to read the entire report, but I have read this far in it. It states:

> In addition to these reductions, the committee recommends a reduction of 10 percent in the total remaining amount estimated for the two bureaus—

That is, Construction and Repair and Engineering.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The report continues:

> This reduction is to be applied in the discretion of the Department.

Is the committee justified in reaching the conclusion that that is just an arbitrary reduction of 10 percent, because there is no explanation of how you arrived at it?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. The committee was justified in making a 10-percent cut because we believe that the amount could be properly eliminated from the estimates in question. Due to the character and the large number of items concerned and the variable factors involved, it is almost impossible to detail the exact items in which cuts should be made. The general reductions in other major items certainly warrant similar reductions in these items.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Does not the gentleman at least believe he should give the Committee of the Whole an opportunity to see how he arrives at the figure of 10 percent? It is rather unusual to say in an appropriation bill, "I will arbitrarily reduce this bureau 10 percent and then the bureau can administer the reduction."

Mr. SCRUGHAM. We thought it was desirable to do that because the estimate proposed large increases over current appropriations for general repair work. The Navy Department was not able to tell us exactly what they proposed to do with the appropriation, as they do not know what work may be necessary during the year. I might say this is one of those apropriations which will all be spent, whether we appropriate one dollar or a hundred million dollars. After careful consideration, the committee determined that 90 percent of the amount requested should be sufficient to meet all requirements during 1941.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes; but following that same line of argument, it would mean that the appropriation is so justified that you could not segregate it and bring about a 10-percent reduction.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. No. There is no other line of naval activity that contains such an infinite number of details as the items given in Engineering and Bureau of Construction and Repair, and the naval authorities themselves could make no detailed segregations. For that reason, instead of attempting the almost impossible task of taking each one of the tens of thousands of details and applying cuts, we thought we would leave details to the judgment of the authorities of the Navy.

After a full consideration of all evidence presented in the hearings, the committee is of the opinion that it will not cripple the Navy in any material way to make a reduction of 10 percent in these activities.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. In view of the first statement of the gentleman about economy and the national debt and the desire to hold down appropriations, I was under the impression that because other committees are doing so, this committee just arbitrarily reduced these two bureaus 10 percent to help bring that about.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I would not say it was arbitrary.

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Yes.

Mr. DARDEN. Will the gentleman be kind enough to give us some information with regard to auxiliary fields requested by the Navy?

In the development of the Air Service and the Bureau of Aeronautics of the Navy the present regular naval aviation establishments are greatly overtaxed. To the end of expanding them, the committee last year authorized or recommended legislation which subsequently authorized the purchase of certain outlying fields that could have been purchased at very reasonable prices. The sum of money set aside for this purpose on both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts was a modest sum. Our present facilities are not sufficient to take care of the planes of the fleet.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. As I recall, we had $70,000,000 appropriated for aviation expansion last year. We have never had any complaint from the naval authorities that they were seriously handicapped with respect to lack of landing fields. To the best of my knowledge and belief the Navy is well provided for in the matter of landing fields, even though some of them are rented.

Mr. DARDEN. I am not talking about new stations, but the auxiliary fields for the stations. There was an item authorized of approximately $70,000,000, which was not for large fields but small fields that are needed as outlying fields for the present stations.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Let us take them up one by one. At Pensacola they have Saufley Field and Corey Field as new fields. I think they have been purchased under the authorization, and to the best of my recollection they have other smaller fields.

Mr. DARDEN. And Felton Farms is being completed?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. The auxiliary field at Norfolk, I think, is rented, and the same applies to the auxiliary fields at San Diego. There is no provision for their purchase.

Mr. DARDEN. There are no auxiliary fields provided for at Norfolk or at San Diego. They were the two operating stations I had in mind.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I think they are taken care of by rental. Owing to the changing conditions and increasing landing speeds of planes, it is deemed unnecessary to go to large expense for auxiliary landing fields, which later may become obsolescent. The needs are now provided for by use of rented fields.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

To the best of my knowledge and belief these stations are all taken care of.

Mr. DARDEN. If it should develop that they are not, would the committee give sympathetic attention to going over the needs of both San Diego and Norfolk?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I do not believe there is such a great rush about purchasing auxiliary air fields. I have visited most of these places and have tried, to the best of my ability, to find out what was needed. I have never heard of any urgent need for auxiliary fields which was not provided for in some way.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. In the appropriation bill the last proviso prohibits any money from being used for the alteration of the 36 top-heavy destroyers.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Is that section 6?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes. I am wondering if the House is to understand that while the defects exist in these destroyers, you are going to let them continue in that shape and not permit them to repair them?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. In the testimony of the Chief of the Bureau of Engineering and the Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, in reply to questions of the committee, as to where the money was coming from to pay for the restabilization of the faulty destroyers, they stated they had sufficient funds already appropriated for the purpose, and they further stated, and it is a matter of record in the hearings, they would not need any money from the pending appropriation bill. In order to make it perfectly clear that none of this appropriation was to be paid to rectify the errors that paragraph was included.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Then it is understood that out of supplemental money or other appropriations the money for this purpose is to be taken?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Yes; and there is testimony to that effect in the hearings.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The other question I want to call attention to is with reference to limitation on expenditures on ships in commission. I thoroughly agree with your objective, but does not the gentleman think that the way it is worded it will force these contractors to go to the Court of Claims and no money will be saved whatsoever? I grant you that your objective is well founded, but I am simply apprehensive that you are going to force them all into the Court of Claims to file their claims for finishing out their contracts, because you provide a time limit.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. In answer to the gentleman's question, let me read from the report on page 8:

> It does not seem illogical to provide some check by Congress on the length of time that money from the appropriations for construction of new vessels can be used on such ships after commissioning, and it certainly would seem that 12 months should afford ample opportunity to make all necessary tests and complete any incidental work required. The accompanying measure carries the provision quoted below in slightly amended form. The words in brackets have been deleted by the committee, and the words in italics have been inserted:
> "Neither the appropriation 'Replacement of naval vessels, construction and machinery,' nor the appropriation 'Replacement of naval vessels, armor, armament, and ammunition,' shall be available for [obligation] expenditure for any [purpose as to] work of any character (including material) undertaken upon ships commissioned prior to July 1, 1939, nor as to any ship commissioned subsequent to such date after 12 months shall have elapsed from commissioning date."

We felt it was only good business to set some limit.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I agree with the gentleman entirely; but does he not think that the committee has set a limit of too short a time?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. No.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. From the information I have had on this subject, it will be at least 18 months or 24 months before all the claims are filed or before the matter can be finally adjusted.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Both the hearings of this year and of last year have been considered, and the mature judgment of the committee is that 12 months' time is sufficient.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I think the gentleman's judgment is probably too severe with respect to the length of time required.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I have not had more time to study the committee report and the hearings on this bill, but this is the way these things come to us and we have to make the best of it. I rise to make just a few observations in connection with the appropriations that have to do with the island of Guam. It seems to me that from a long-pull standpoint, we should do whatever is necessary in the way of providing equipment on Guam to facilitate the movement of passengers and freight by airships. While I voted against the appropriation in the bill that came up last session, I have in mind that I may support the proposition if there is a test vote in this present bill. I think that as we move closer to the independence of the Philippines that the people of the United States, as well as the Filipinos, will take on a more serious attitude insofar as naval and military defense of the islands are concerned. If the Asiatic war troubles continue and perhaps increase, as we move toward July 4, 1946, our people will have to reach definite conclusions as to whether or not we are to step out of the Philippines from a military and naval standpoint, and let occur in the Far East whatever may take place as a result of our complete withdrawal, or reach conclusions as to whether or not we go back into the Philippines from a military and naval standpoint in the event a major far eastern power decides to move into the Philippines against the desires of the Filipinos, or with their cooperation. If the thought is in the mind of some of the Filipino leaders that we will furnish them military and naval assistance subsequent to their obtaining independence, that is something for the United States to become concerned about. On the other hand, if the Filipinos are in position to make their own economic situation work out satisfactorily, with whatever trade agreements they may arrange with us, or whatever trading arrangements they may bring into operation through the exchange of goods between the Philippines and the United States on a free-of-duty basis and at the same time take care of their own military and naval defense directly or in conjunction with some other foreign power, then that is something additional our people can well be concerned about. So it seems to me that this proposition with reference to Guam has something to do or, as a matter of fact, has directly to do with our present connection with the Philippine Islands, and also whatever connection we may desire to continue with, subsequent to the granting of independence, economically and politically.

It is from the Philippine aspect that I approach the fortifying of Guam when the question of fortification comes up; or if the question never comes up, then proceed with such commercial equipment as we desire there, and as we need, in order to maintain our air service between the Pacific coast and the Philippine Islands and our interests in China which our present foreign policy, so generously supported by the people, is now aggressively defending.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Before the gentleman leaves Guam, does he understand that this bill makes no provision whatsoever for the fortification of that island, but simply provides for a safe landing place by eliminating some coral reefs and building a breakwater, and that whatever we do here with regard to this appropriation, planes will continue to land there; and unless we take care of it in this bill to make safe landing places, lives will be lost and planes wrecked? It has nothing to do with military fortification.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is what I understood.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. SUTPHIN. If I understood the chairman correctly, he said that the aviation activities there at the present time are largely commercial.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. That is correct.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Then is this not a subsidy for a commercial line if they are the only ones using it?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. If that is true, why include this item in a national-defense bill? If it is a harbor development, that should come before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. If the gentleman from Massachusetts has stated the matter correctly, certainly the item has no place in a naval defense bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I would not take exception to that observation.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I might say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] that I think the Navy has the facilities much better than any other organization to take care of this type of project, eliminating coral reefs and deepening the harbor and making it safe. It does not make much difference what department takes care of it, it seems to me.

Mr. MICHENER. Oh, it is very material as a matter of jurisdiction what department takes care of it. Rivers and harbors are looked after in the House by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and the Naval Affairs Committee looks out for our naval defense. It seems to me it is begging the question to say that it does not make much difference what committee has jurisdiction.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I might say further to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] that of course Guam is under the Navy. The Army has nothing to do with it. The Navy is equipped to take care of this work and can do it more economically than any other branch.

Mr. MICHENER. But the Navy cannot do anything in Guam under its authority except it is used in connection with national defense.

Mr. SUTPHIN. If I might answer the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY] the Navy did not do the actual work on the other stations. They gave it out under cost-plus contracts in Alaska and at Midway and Wake Islands. They were all private contracts. The Navy did not do the work.

Mr. MICHENER. That would be the same thing here. The Army engineers and river and harbor engineers are far superior to any engineers of the Navy to develop a harbor.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Midway and Wake were not let out on contracts. They were handled by the Navy.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Oh, no. I have the name of the contractor who did the job.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, we started out with the Philippines. For years we kept them under the War Department. Now we shift them to the Department of the Interior. Why they should be put under the Department of the Interior is beyond my comprehension, but that is the way we do things. Now here is a proposition where we are shifting the harbor improvements of Guam away from rivers and harbors to the Navy Department. The men who control these situations have reasons for them. I think it is perfectly in order for us to question those reasons. But, as I view the far eastern situation and our relation thereto, as tied in through the Philippine uncertainty and the Philippine problem, I do not become too technical on a point such as is now before us.

I approach Guam almost entirely through the Philippine gateway—what is our objective relative therto? I am rash enough to make the statement that I think it is only a matter of time, and long before independence is granted under the present Independence Act, that you will proceed to fortify Guam on a big scale, and I think you will be giving serious consideration to the question of fortifying the Philippine Islands before we are out of them. It seems to me that is about the way things are moving in the Far East. To me it all ties in with our far-eastern policy.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman favor carrying out the Philippine independence law as it now stands, and getting rid of the Philippines, or is he in favor of our continuing to remain in the Philippines and fortifying the Philippines?

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the United States will proceed to give the Philippine Islands their independence in accordance with the present bill and wash our hands completely of all Philippine responsibility, economic, military, and from a naval standpoint, and keep the signatures of our officials off of agreements to the effect that we will guarantee and protect the neutrality of the Philippines, then I am in favor of our proceeding as now outlined. Otherwise, I reserve my opinion on the matter.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. RICHARDS. Do I understand the position of the gentleman to be that he is in favor of this Guam provision because he believes and understands it is a forerunner of the actual fortification of Guam?

Mr. CRAWFORD. No. I am somewhat in favor of it for two reasons. One is I think it is worth something to our country from the standpoint of national defense to have this clipper service which is now in operation, which we will call a commercial service. And as we use Federal funds to subsidize other types of operation, both on water and on land and in the air, I am not so particular about the fact that we are subsidizing a commercial operation as now carried by whoever owns the China Clipper service or the Philippine Clipper service, or whatever it is called. It is all very closely connected with national defense. So, if we are to get completely out of the Philippines, kiss them good-bye politically and economically and from a military standpoint and from a defense standpoint—when I say "economically" I do not mean to treat them dissimilarly to what we treat other countries. I think they are entitled to as good treatment as we give the Cubans, and I will say even a little better than we give the Cubans. So I think that explains itself. I see no reason why we should not proceed to provide these commercial facilities at Guam.

Mr. RICHARDS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. RICHARDS. The gentleman will admit that the purpose behind this thing is practically the same thing that was behind the authorization in last year's naval appropriation bill, which was defeated by the House of Representatives?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think this is the beginning, with more to come.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MAAS. Is there not a considerable difference? This is for harbor dredging. A year ago it was for shore construction and a number of other things in addition to what is in this bill. This is simply harbor dredging.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I interpreted the gentleman's question as being very broad fundamentally when looking toward future development.

Mr. RICHARDS. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Minnesota, who is a very able member of the Naval Affairs Committee, that according to my recollection there is no difference. There is a difference in words, but last year's provision was for harbor improvements. This is for dredging the harbor. It was argued here in Congress last year that the harbor improvements in view at that time were dredging operations.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, to keep the record straight, last year's proposal did also include shore development, which is not included in this proposal at all.

Mr. RICHARDS. There is a provision just down below that does provide for shore development.

Mr. MAAS. Not in connection with the item that was in the bill last year.

Mr. RICHARDS. There is "water supply."

Mr. MICHENER. Then if the gentleman is correct, the matter should go to the Rivers and Harbors Committee, because if there is no improvement except river and harbor improvement, it should go to that committee.

Mr. MAAS. They do not need an authorization at all. This is an appropriation. They need no authorization to do this harbor work. This is authorized under the general law for the fourteenth naval district. This is an appropriation.

Mr. MICHENER. I did not understand it that way.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, going ahead with the other point which I wanted to develop and which to me has as much to do with national defense as do our Army and Navy appropriations, I wish to refer to some of the remarks in the President's address of last Saturday afternoon to the National Citizenship Institute of American Youth. I am quoting from the President's remarks as published in the Sunday Star. He said:

> I have said on many occasions that the greatest achievement of the past 7 years in the United States has been * * * the awakening of many millions of American men and women to an understanding of the processes of their own governments—local, State, and Federal.
> We know that the prosperity of the 1920's can properly be compared to the prosperity of the Mississippi bubble days before the bubble burst, when everybody was money mad, when the money changers owned the temple, when the Nation as a whole forgot the restraint of decent ethics and simple morals, and when the Government in Washington gave completely free rein to what they called individual liberty and the virtual ownership of government itself by the so-called best minds which wholly controlled our finances and our economics.

The President a little further on in his address, speaking of our exports, said:

> Our exports for the calendar year 1932 were worth $1,600,000,000. In 1939 they were worth nearly $3,200,000,000, an increase of 97 percent.

He also pointed out that we have not solved the problem of old people, stating that the solution of the problem was evolutionary. He said:

> We have made beginnings with the Old Age Pension Act, but we know that it is only a beginning and that through the next 10 or 20 years the system must be extended and improved. "Ham-and-eggs" and other plans will not do it because they are all open to the simple objection that they either print so much paper money that the money would soon be worthless or that the whole burden would be placed on the shoulders of the younger workers.

When the President made those statements he knew that since 1934 we have purchased, in round figures, $10,000,000,000 worth of gold; and, of course, this purchase increased our export trade. Taking his own words, we know that his policy and the administration's policy has been to trade goods for gold, and that has been the great contributing factor to this increased export of goods.

The people went along with President Wilson when he traded goods for I O U's. In the last balance sheet of the United States Government published by the Comptroller General you will find a little over $14,000,000,000 reflected in the balance sheet as assets which we accepted in payment of those goods. You can draw your own conclusions as to how much those I O U's are worth. Personally, I do not believe they are worth 1 percent of the valuation carried in the United States balance sheet.

Mr. Roosevelt supports the policy of trading goods for gold instead of I O U's, and as we trade goods for gold our exports increase; and so far as use by our people is concerned, the gold we are receiving for the goods is about as worthless, in my opinion, as the claims reflected in the balance sheet to which I have referred.

The President also knows that the British Empire consisting primarily of Canada, South Africa, and Australia, so far as gold is concerned, together with Japan and Russia, keep the trap baited with gold and the administration goes along with it. I hear you say: "If that is true, why does the President follow such policy?" Well, it is the easy way to do it, it is not the way out, but it is the easy way. We could trade our goods for critical and strategic goods we really need, such as tin, rubber, and coffee. We could even trade more goods to Cuba for the sugar we take from Cuba and pay them less cash, if we wanted to do so.

We could purchase investments in our industries which are held by foreign nationals, and thereby recover control of our own factories, mines, railroads, and utilities. But, the President goes the easy way—and by this I mean he buys gold through the banks and he does it in such a manner that the people do not understand just what is going on. But the President knows all about the details. He has experts who can keep him informed. He knows almost every major country in the world benefits through his gold-buying policy except the good old United States. Oh, yes; we place a high dollar value on gold; we stabilize the export dollar price; we guarantee prosperity to the gold-producing countries for all the new gold they mine and for all the old gold they dehoard or melt up.

He buys more gold we do not need; which we do not use; and as it grows in volume it takes away the earning power of the savings the old people have accumulated down through the years as they worked and economized and denied themselves the little luxuries they might have so much enjoyed, and all to the end that they would not be dependent upon the poorhouse when they approached the sunset of life.

Oh, yes; by bringing this gold in and financing it through the banking machinery it makes it quite easy for the administration, for the President, and so very advantageous to all the gold miners and shippers from other parts of the wide world. Individuals, at least not very many of them, do not have to be consulted for their private decisions as would be necessary, if we were trading goods for goods. By bringing the gold in through the banks it can be paid for with paper money (sure, with check money) and few people know what is going on. If real paper money (by this I mean currency) was issued and released into circulation in payment for the gold, millions of people would know about that and understand the transaction. And of course, many would say that is inflationary and must not be permitted. If too many said that, it would create political embarrassment for the President and his administration. But let me say to you with all the emphasis possible, such a method of payment for the gold that flows to us in unceasing streams would be no more damaging or destructive or dangerous than the very way the President is now financing his gold purchases. The President knows this also.

The President talks to the young folks about the welfare of the old people. He tells them about the low interest rates. He speaks of the great increase in exports and the rise in production. And while the President talks to the young folks, more gold comes in; paper dollars in the form of credits are issued therefor, the excess reserves of member banks rapidly rise, the banks demand more and more Government I O U's, the Federal debt increases, the Secretary of the Treasury says, "Government credit is at the top," the earning power of savings declines and the bondholders obtain a stronger hold on the people. These factors all have to do with the exports about which the President bragged—goods for gold.

The rate of interest, the earning power of investment, the earning power of savings accounts and insurance policies declines, and it becomes more impossible for those with savings to live on the lower interest rates which are paid, and the lower interest rates about which the President bragged last Saturday afternoon.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, we have made a great error in setting the price of gold at $35 an ounce. The President makes a greater error in recommending that we continue the policy of buying more gold we do not need and cannot use. He knows it will encourage inflation to destroy the equities of our people of the middle and lower economic groups. The President understands our banking laws. He knows what a gold base of $16,000,000,000 held by the 12 Federal Reserve banks would permit under present laws, if the money changers—the bankers—ever permitted their anxiety to make money to cause the credit expansion possible with this large gold base and operating under our fractional reserve system. About this, I shall say more at a later date. But once Federal Reserve notes are held lawful money to serve as a base or as reserves of the Federal Reserve banks for deposits held by them and to the credit of the member banks, the green lights will then be shining for an expansion of commercial credit and demand deposits of astounding sums. And, if Federal Reserve notes are not lawful money in the meaning of the Federal Reserve Act, just what kind of money are they? And if Federal Reserve notes can be issued at a ratio of two and one-half times the gold base held by the Federal Reserve banks, cannot there be issued approximately $40,000,000,000 of such notes? If the $40,000,000,000 of notes can be issued and if they are held lawful money, then what is to prevent the expansion of hundreds of billions of commercial credit if the bankers' judgment ever becomes distorted in the manner it did preceding the bursting of the Mississippi bubble and the days of the money changers referred to by the President in his Saturday afternoon address? Protecting price levels and the earning power of thrift and the equities of our people are as essential to our general welfare as are floating navies and standing armies.

As the President promotes policies which destroy the interest rates earned by savings, he strikes at the very heart of our private enterprise and capitalistic system. Is it reasonable for us to assume investments in the form of stocks and bonds are to pay returns if those in the form of savings accounts and insurance contracts will not?

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. ANGELL. Is it not also a fact that there is a fictitious price on the value of gold of $35 an ounce instead of $20.67? Gold produced in Russia costs $11 an ounce. This means we are paying the Russians three times what it costs them to produce their gold.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I have been a Member of the House of Representatives for 9 years and I have never been so depressed since becoming a Member of this body as I am at the present time. Why have I become depressed? Is it because of personal reasons? Not at all. Is it because I am worried about this country? Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is the reason I am depressed now. I am deeply worried because if we proceed along the lines followed the past 5 years in connection with the operation of our Government it will eventually lead to our downfall. I cannot see a ray of hope unless we do differently from what we are doing at the present time.

No one is more sympathetic toward the proposition of taking care of the people of this country who need food, clothing, and shelter than I am. I will go to the limit in that respect, insofar as it is sensible and sound. But I believe that the people themselves should work, earn money, and save in order to be able to acquire the necessities of life and the happiness and enjoyment that goes with good healthful work. That should be the object of every individual citizen of America. I think it is the duty of the Government to see that our citizens have the opportunity and chance to work. The duty devolves upon the legislators of America, not only in the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States but in every legislative body of every State in the Union, to see that those advantages are given to its citizens.

But, Mr. Chairman, we have created bureau after bureau. We have permitted these bureaus to become so top-heavy and so burdensome that they will fall of their own weight—then the Nation itself will topple over. The very foundations of our Government will become unstable and our national life will be ruined. We will lose our present form of government and a dictator will follow. We have had 150 years of national life enjoyed by the American people. Now, we see an onward rush in the way of bigger bureaus and greater departments of Government, doing things and performing functions to an extent that, if continued, this Nation will be wrecked financially, and when we wreck the financial stability of the Nation the very form of our Government will be lost. If this happens, we will have a government such as we know not befall us.

After 150 years, America has shown itself to be the greatest Nation on the face of the earth. Mr. Chairman, we have been and we are going far afield of the intention of our forefathers. We are inviting trouble, and I make that statement in all sincerity. I have heard many Members of Congress make the statement, "Let us go on. Let us see what is going to happen. Let us repudiate our debts." The man who makes that statement has not very much backbone. He has a wishbone where his backbone ought to be. He has not the stamina that a good, sound American citizen ought to have, let alone a Member of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I have quoted many times from various speeches made by the President of the United States, but I am going to quote again. I think this is one of the most sensible statements that President Roosevelt has ever made. This is taken from a speech delivered by the President in Pittsburgh, Pa., on October 19, 1932:

> The credit of the family depends chiefly upon whether that family is living within its income. And that is equally true of the Nation. If the Nation is living within its income, its credit is good.

If Government lives beyond its income for a year or two, it can usually borrow temporarily at reasonable rates. But if, like a spendthrift, it throws discretion to the winds and is willing to make no sacrifice at all in spending; if it extends its taxing to the limit of the people's power to pay and continues to pile up deficits, then it is on the road to bankruptcy.

America is on the road to bankruptcy. It is not far off. Are we going to stop it? To give you concrete evidence of that fact, may I tell you that, at the present time, we have a national deficit, according to the Treasury statement of February 8, 1940, of $42,219,115,506. Since July 1 last year we have gone in the red to the extent of $2,437,133,055. We have heaped deficit on deficit during the last 10 or 12 years, yet we have as many unemployed men today as we had 10 years ago. We have been working hard trying to find employment for these people for 10 years, in Government service, but have not succeeded. Something is wrong. We should change the late laws. I could cite a lot of things here, but they might be interpreted as being political, and I do not want to be political today. I just want to be as sincere as I can, and I hope to have the hearty cooperation of the Republicans and Democrats alike in solving this problem.

One of the first things to do in this direction is keep our appropriations within bounds. Today we are asked to consider an appropriation bill for the Navy Department. Let me give you some of the increases that have been made in these naval appropriation bills during the last few years. In 1936 we appropriated $432,859,729; in 1937, $528,543,000; in 1938, $519,320,000; in 1939, $623,620,000; in 1940, $778,488,000, in addition we had a supplemental appropriation of $145,047,000. This made a total for last year of $924,000,000. We appropriated for the Army last year $874,876,000. This makes a grand total of $1,798,400,000 that we appropriated for the Army and Navy. Think of that, Mr. Chairman—$1,798,400,000 for the Army and Navy last year! I am not a pacifist but I believe we are going wild in preparation for war.

A naval appropriation bill is now presented to us carrying $966,772,878, which is a larger amount than last year. I presume we will have a corresponding increase in the Army appropriation bill.

It is true that the world is in bad shape on account of war, but I question very much that the United States will become involved in that war over there if we do what we ought to do. We are not going to send any of our boys across the sea. I cannot conceive of anything that my happen in Europe, Asia, or Africa that would make it necessary for the United States to send even one boy across the sea with a musket on his back, or that would compel America to send its Navy over there to defend anything, because we have no possessions over there. I will give you my word now that there is no band that will make such good music, and there is no amount of oratory that will convince me I should vote to send our boys across the water. I just am not going to do it. And my reason is I am more interested in American boys and girls than in any others in the world and I am interested in the United States more than any other country in the world.

We have an item in the bill to improve Guam, near the Chinese coast. Let us give the island away before our improvement and fortification gets us into war. Let us stay away from Europe, Asia, and Africa in any possessions of real estate.

What are we doing in our other appropriations? We are trying to cut them below what we call the Budget or keep them within the Budget. However, when the bell rings at the end of this session I question very much whether we will not have gone above the Budget estimate in the sum total of our appropriation. Certainly we will be a billion over a balanced Budget.

I believe the Members of Congress have a better feeling and a better spirit today of trying to keep expenditures within bounds, but I question whether we have enough intestinal fortitude to say to some of our constituents back home when they ask for this and that thing that we do not believe our National Government should go any deeper in debt. I promise the Congress now that I will not agree to anything the people back home may want if I believe it is wrong and will lead to our financial downfall, and I have tried to be conservative in that. I believe you, as Members of Congress, must be conservative, must possess business ability in spending as well as in taxation.

I have had the Post Office Department try to build post-office buildings in my district, where we have had good facilities, good post-office buildings which are rented, furnished, heated, lighted, and furnished with janitor service, by individuals at a cost the Federal Government could not match. If a post office were built it would be at an advance in cost of from 300 to 400 percent. That is sensible business procedure. I have gone down to the Post Office Department and told them I did not want those post-office buildings constructed, because I do not believe the Federal Government is in a position to do things like that now when there are other localities, which may not have such large receipts, where it would be better if the Government would build post offices there and more practical.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROSS. I wish to tell the gentleman that in my city of York an annex to the post office is being built, and they have torn down one of the best post offices in the United States. They just have a wreck there that will cost the Federal Government about $300,000. Every man in the city is damning the proposition as a reckless expenditure of money that no one can explain.

Mr. RICH. I am against extravagance and waste in Government any place. There has never been so much extravagance or so much waste as there has been in the last few years and as is going on right now in the departments. I have interrogated men from the departments in connection with the hearings on appropriations lately, and I find that these men who ask for funds for the operation of their departments are interested primarily in seeing how much money they can get out of the Government so they can increase the scope of their departments. When you ask them what they are trying to do to see where we will get the money back to help defray the expense of the department, they say, "That is not our function; it is the function of Congress." I have told these men from the Government bureaus who are interested only in spending—and I tell you now that they are only going to wreck their own jobs, because eventually the departments will fail; when the Government fails the departments fail—and then they will lose their jobs by virtue of the fact that their Government will be ruined.

When you think of the large number of buildings we are erecting, when you think of the added costs that will be placed on future generations of taxpayers, when you see our Government employees doubled in 7 years, when you think of the increase in the size of the Army and the size of the Navy—and I may say I do not fear any foreign country's coming over here to attack us—why should we do what we have planned in this naval appropriations bill right now?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. We have in this bill and with what has already been authorized 10 battleships under construction. We will have 9 cruisers, 3 aircraft carriers, 50 destroyers, 26 submarines, 2 destroyer tenders, 3 seaplane tenders, large, 6 seaplane tenders, small, 2 submarine tenders, 3 minesweepers, 2 oilers, 3 fleet tugs, 1 minelayer, and 1 repair ship. Much other equipment, airplanes, and so forth, and so forth.

This morning I asked our Committee on Appropriations if anyone on that committee knew what the cost of upkeep of this Navy would be 5 years from now when these vessels are either completed or are still under construction, and nobody there could tell me. I have tried to find that out from the Government officials, but I cannot find anyone who will prognosticate or even give you an idea of what it is going to cost. I can see a great increase myself in personnel and expenses.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I consider the gentleman one of the most successful businessmen in this House, with one of the finest economic minds. I wish to ask him this practical question, man to man. The gentleman runs a business. I run a business. With our situation as it is this very moment, on what basis of fact can the gentleman or I or anyone else who really thinks, make an accurate forecast of the cost—I am talking about dollar costs and overhead expenses—of operating a large plant in the form of buildings, machinery, and concrete, or a large plant in the form of a battleship, 2, 3, or 5 years from now? On what basis of fact can one make such an estimate?

Mr. RICH. We have some idea of what it costs to operate a battleship now. Somebody could recapitulate the figures for these ships and give us at least a smattering idea of what it is going to cost to operate them.

May I say further to the gentleman from Michigan that I asked the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to get the Committee on Ways and Means to sit down with his committee and talk this problem over. I have advised it in the House many times. The purpose is to get a well-rounded idea of what it is going to cost in a business sense to operate this Government, from the fact that we have gone on with this spending program of enlargement. Wise businessmen would do things in that way, and I think that we could have a better idea of the situation if we did that. We should know how much we have to spend before we spend it, or at least how we can obtain funds to spend. But if we go ahead and build and build and build, and it gets so topheavy that our taxpayers are unable to stand the load, and pay for the upkeep, the whole thing will topple over and we will go smash.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I appreciate the gentleman's position and agree with him; but we ask these gentlemen what this cost will be in dollars, and they cannot answer.

If we asked them what it would cost to operate this battleship in oil, in grease, in food, or in clothing for the men on it, and so forth, they could answer in quantity or in tons, but they could not answer in dollars, and here is one reason, if the gentleman will permit me to say so. We have at this very minute a legalized right for those who operate banks and lending institutions of this country to expand commercial loans and demand deposits to perhaps as high as several hundred billion dollars, and the only reason that is not put into operation is because these so-called money changers do not permit their judgment to go in that direction. Our great gold base is the cue to the potential credit inflation and price increase. The legal authority is in the banking laws of this country. Now, if the banks proceed to do that 25 or 50 or 75 percent, the dollar cost of operating these things may quadruple, quintuple, and sextuple, and these individuals know that, and that is the reason they hesitate to answer.

Mr. RICH. I will say to the gentleman that we have got to change a lot of laws we have on the statute books, and this may call for a drastic revision in our banking laws and in a manner giving us the gold standard and make our money stable and sound, so that we may know from what point we are going to operate on a long-term commitment basis and a good, sound business manner. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DARDEN].

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to utilize part of my time in asking questions of the gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee.

The Navy Act of 1938 provided for an expansion of 20 percent in the naval forces of the United States. In order to take care of this expansion, it was found necessary to materially expand the yards and shore stations of the Navy. As I understand it, approximately $25,000,000 is estimated by the Navy as the necessary cost, and I further understand that this sum of money has not been provided.

I wonder if any member of the committee would be good enough to tell me what is the reason or what is the plan of the committee in respect to this matter.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman restate his question?

Mr. DARDEN. As a result of the expansion contemplated under the 1938 bill, it was found necessary to expand materially the shore stations of the Navy, particularly the manufacturing establishments, because a great deal of this ship construction is being done in Government yards. It was thought that a minimum of, roughly, $25,000,000 would be necessary in order to undertake this work. I understand this money has not been provided for any of the stations, and I am interested as to the plans of the Appropriations Committee in reference to the matter.

Mr. CALDWELL. The committee did not have before it an estimate from the Budget on those items, and for that reason did not go into the matter.

Mr. DARDEN. I understand it is true that the Budget did not approve the expenditure, but I think we ought to give very serious consideration to the matter.

Shipbuilding costs are high. They are going to continue high so long as our equipment is inefficient, particularly in our own yards. I am not prepared to say what the situation is in the private yards of the country, but it is my belief that the machine-tool equipment in the Government yards is sadly in need of replacement. I believe the necessary money expended for machine-tool equipment and enlargement of the manufacturing facilities of the yards can be saved and repaid within a space of a few years.

It is a very unfortunate thing for us not only to delay our shipbuilding program, but also make it more expensive by our refusal to appropriate the money necessary to put the establishments on an efficient basis to handle the additional work that has been placed on them within the last 2 years.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MAAS. Does not the gentleman think that with this extensive program ahead of us, we not only would save a great deal of money in the ultimate cost, but would speed up construction considerably if we did modernize our tool equipment and the facilities for producing the ships?

Mr. DARDEN. There is not any question about it.

The navy yards have become, in the last 20 or 25 years, great manufacturing establishments. They are charged with taking care of the repair work incident to a large navy and with the building work that has been given to them since the Naval Act of 1934. We have not developed or improved our industrial facilities as we should have. As a result of this, the shipbuilding program is not only being delayed but it is costing too much. The money necessary to make these changes could soon be saved if we were willing to make the initial outlay.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. I yield.

Mr. CALDWELL. I believe there is a great deal in what the gentleman has to say. I think the committee, or certainly several members of the committee, is in accord with the views as expressed by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia. Furthermore, I believe it is the opinion of at least one member of that committee, speaking for myself, that we are not going to construct ships in this country at a minimum of cost until we decentralize that industry and spread it over a wider area.

Mr. DARDEN. I very much hope that some consideration can be given or that some further consideration can be given to this matter, because not only is the money not appropriated for the extensions made necessary by the act of 1938, but the authorization act now pending, which contemplates a further increase, will need additional shop equipment in order to make it effective.

There is another item that I want to touch on for a moment. In the expansion of our air stations we have failed to provide any auxiliary or outlying fields, not for the training stations, such as Pensacola, but for the great operating stations. We are sadly deficient in the fields necessary for the operation of the fleet. Let us take the Atlantic coast.

There are no air facilities on the Atlantic coast worthy of note. The Navy owns one field of approximately 125 acres of land in Norfolk, and that constitutes the sole operating base for naval aircraft on the Atlantic coast. It is true that we are building a station at Jacksonville, Fla., and we are shortly to start building one in the Narragansett Bay area, but it will be several years before these stations are finished, and when they are finished they will need auxiliary fields in order to make them fully efficient. I understand that the same thing is true on the Pacific coast. Last year we authorized auxiliary fields for Norfolk and San Diego and the cost was comparatively small, about $700,000 for both of the items, and we have so far not been able to secure the necessary money.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes.

Mr. MAAS. In addition to the value during peace times, is it not absolutely essential that we have these outlying fields in case of war, so that we can scatter our squadrons? You would not for a minute leave all your squadrons at a naval base.

Mr. DARDEN. That is unquestionably true, and the gentleman has had a good deal of experience of his own in that respect, because he has been in the air service and in the Reserve for a number of years. We cannot concentrate our air force on the Atlantic coast, as the gentleman knows, because we have not the facilities.

Mr. MAAS. And we cannot provide those overnight with the modern type of airplane. They have to be provided in advance of mobilization.

Mr. DARDEN. That is true. It is true that we are renting a number of fields, as the chairman of the subcommittee explained to us a short time ago. We are renting a number of small fields, but these leases can be canceled at will on either side and, in addition to that, the permanent runways necessary cannot be built under the law. We ought to acquire a certain number of additional fields. The outlay of money would be comparatively small. The use of the great bases in which we have invested millions of dollars depends to no small extent upon the availability of these small fields.

There is another matter that I want to touch on for a moment. I think we ought to face definitely this problem in reference to Guam. I think we ought to understand what we are about. When the matter was presented last year I said at the time that I was opposed to the fortification of Guam, and I still entertain that view, but I did vote for the measure before the House in the spring that provided for the improvement of the harbor at Guam. This bill carries an item of some three or four million dollars looking to harbor improvements in the island. They are necessary if the harbor is to be fully utilized, but the real problem we will be faced with in this House in less than 3 years more is whether or not we are going to change our policy with reference to the Philippines. That is a most important matter which we have to consider. There is a strong movement on foot here—many of you are familiar with it—looking to the guarantee by the Government of the territorial integrity of the Philippines with the local government left entirely in the hands of the officials of the islands. That will commit us to a tremendous venture in the Far East. We will be saddled with the burden of providing military establishments for the Philippines that are located in a dangerous part of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. DARDEN. I do not think I could use that much time.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he is opposed to fortifying the Island of Guam?

Mr. DARDEN. I was very much opposed to it last year, and I am inclined to think that I would feel the same way about it now.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Guam is surrounded by the Japanese-mandated islands, is it not?

Mr. DARDEN. I do not know that it is surrounded. It is very close to them.

Mr. SUTPHIN. And we have seen Japanese planes flying over Guam, and they are of such type that they could have flown from the mainland of Japan.

Mr. DARDEN. Yes; I expect it is close enough to the Caroline Islands to be in range of aircraft operating from bases on those islands.

Mr. SUTPHIN. And no one has ever contended that we could hold Guam in the event of attack.

Mr. DARDEN. Oh, no. I think the gentleman is mistaken there. I believe that if we were willing to go to the tremendous expense of fortifying Guam it could be made practically impregnable.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Yes; at a cost of half a billion or seven or eight hundred million dollars.

Mr. DARDEN. It would be a costly undertaking; it would run into the hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. SUTPHIN. And the gentleman does not think that we could hold the Philippines, in the event of attack, for more than 20 minutes.

Mr. DARDEN. No; but I think it would be easier to hold Guam than to hold the Philippines.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield there to permit me to ask a question of the chairman of the subcommittee?

Mr. DARDEN. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I call the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee to the fact that in his report he says that $50,000,000 for the replacement of naval facilities is made immediately available. I fail to find it anywhere in the bill. I am inclined to think it was an oversight.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. It is a typographical error and should be corrected.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It is important that an amendment be offered to correct that when that item is reached.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SUTPHIN] observed that even if we fortified Guam we could not hold it. It was never contemplated by the Navy Department that even the fortification of Guam would enable us to hold it indefinitely, was it, but that such improvement as they wanted for Guam would enable us to delay aggressive action toward the United States, and that that very delay would serve the strategic purpose of improving Guam? Was that not the idea?

Mr. DARDEN. I believe that was the testimony of all the officers who appeared before the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. MOTT. I wish the gentleman would clear up a statement made on the floor a moment ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], who said it was impossible to find out anything about what it was going to cost to operate the Navy. In the gentleman's long experience on the Naval Affairs Committee and his contact with the Navy Department, I think the gentleman is familiar with the fact that the Navy Department can tell us now what it is going to cost to operate the Navy this year, and from their experience they can tell what it has cost from year to year, and from their experience they can give us an estimate sufficiently accurate to satisfy any businessman what it would cost to operate the Navy in the year to come.

Mr. DARDEN. I think that is true, because if my recollection serves me correctly, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] asked the officers recently appearing before the Naval Affairs Committee that question, and they were able to tell us, roughly, the cost of operating a battleship, a cruiser, and the lighter ships.

Mr. MOTT. I thought such an inference as was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] should not go unchallenged.

Mr. DARDEN. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania was mistaken in that.

Mr. SUTPHIN. I asked Admiral Stark that question, and he put in the hearings the cost of operating battleships, carriers, heavy cruisers, light cruisers, destroyers, and submarines.

Mr. DARDEN. There is no question in my mind on this point, and that is, if we are going to fortify any place in the Far East, the fortification ought to take place at Guam as a military matter, because, in the first place, the Philippine Islands are difficult to defend. In the second place, they are people who want their independence and to whom we promised independence. For my own part, when 1946 comes I hope we will wish them well on their way. I do not want to see the United States involved further in the Philippine Islands, particularly when the Filipinos themselves want to be free. If we want to attempt to protect by force our trade in the East, the pivotal point is the island of Guam. That is the place to fortify if we determine to take that step, and not the Philippine Islands. With Guam strongly fortified, the Philippines would be protected if we wanted to take that gamble. I do not want to do it. I do not want to assume responsibility for the Philippine Islands beyond 1946. When that time arrives I want to see them go on their way as provided now by legislation.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. I yield.

Mr. MAAS. I think I would go along with the gentleman on his point of view, but does the gentleman honestly think that when we cut the Philippines loose in 1946 what they are going to get is independence?

Mr. DARDEN. That I do not know, but I think what they are going to get from us is independence. Whether they will get it from the rest of the world I do not know. But I am not willing to see this country committed to protecting the Philippines indefinitely in the future. When their independence is given them in 1946 I want to see our obligations in the Far East terminated as far as they are concerned.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. I yield.

Mr. RICHARDS. Now, suppose we do give the Philippine Islands independence in 1946, as has been proposed by this Congress; does the gentleman contend in that event that Guam should be fortified?

Mr. DARDEN. No; I have not contended that at all. I say that if we want a military outpost in the Far East, Guam is the place to fortify, even if we retain the Philippine Islands.

Mr. RICHARDS. Philippines or no Philippines?

Mr. DARDEN. Philippines or no Philippines. If we are going to do any fortifying in the Far East, Guam, is the place to do it, but I do not believe that that fortifying is necessary. I think the harbor at Guam should be developed for the use of our own ships and our own people, but beyond that I see no reason for us to go at the present time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the gentleman believe the Philippine Islands will take their independence in 1946?

Mr. DARDEN. I think they will, but I am not an authority on that matter. I have never been a member of the committee dealing with those affairs, and I was not a member of the group that went to celebrate the beginning of their independence a year or two ago. I am not sufficiently familiar with what their representatives want.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I may be wrong on this, but my understanding is that it is not obligatory upon the Philippine Islands to accept their independence at that time. I was wondering how the gentleman felt, as to whether or not they were going to accept their independence.

Mr. DARDEN. We had some discussion of that a year or two ago. I think it involved a point that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] brought out. My recollection is that it is obligatory, and when the time is reached they must accept their independence, unless by legislation we alter the situation.

Mr. MAAS. That is right.

Mr. DARDEN. Now, that is the work that is going on here in Washington right now—a determined effort to have us review this situation and to again assume or continue sponsorship of the Philippines. If that is going to be done, if this Congress is going to continue to sponsor the Philippines, then Guam ought to be fortified now.

It will cost $300,000,000 or $400,000,000, but this step ought to be taken now if we are after 1946 to continue to sponsor the Philippine Islands, for we shall need it.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DARDEN. I yield.

Mr. RICHARDS. And the gentleman will admit that this country time and time again has reiterated its promise to the Philippines to give them their independence; and the Philippines time and time again as a people have stated that they wanted their independence.

Mr. DARDEN. I admit it, of course, and I am for it; I am for the legislation that is now on the books. I think the Philippines should be given their independence, and I think we ought to stand by the present legislation.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARDEN. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Up until 1946, or at least until such time as the Philippines have become independent, it is obligatory upon us to defend them, is it not?

Mr. DARDEN. I understand it is; yes.

Mr. MOTT. And if in order properly to defend them a further improvement of Guam is necessary, why not do it now?

Mr. DARDEN. I think the improvements of the harbor of Guam ought to be carried out regardless of the defense item. I think the sum asked by this committee for the improvement of the harbor there is necessary, for navigation is almost impossible there on account of the coral heads. I think this work ought to be undertaken, and I believe the Navy is in better shape than anyone else to undertake it.

Mr. MOTT. I have often felt that were it not for the fact that Japan is pretty well tied up now in China she might not wait until 1946 to make a move against the Philippines.

Mr. DARDEN. That may be true. Another factor which accentuates the difficulty in reference to this matter is the present very general talk in our own country as to an embargo against Japan. Whatever may be the gentleman's sympathies or my sympathies—and surely mine are all with China—I believe the minute we make the final, irrevocable decision to embargo Japan we shall be dangerously near violence in the east. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, the question of fortifying Guam was discussed a year ago when this appropriation bill was in the House. Many Members opposed the appropriation asked for at that time for the purpose of fortifying Guam. I hope that as the debate goes on in the House this week it is made clear that the item carried in this bill is not an item for the fortification of Guam, but simply one to improve the harbor of Guam, something that should be done whether or not we ever have need to fortify the island.

This appropriation is necessary not only to protect the rights and property of the United States Navy but for the benefit of our civilian flyers who are doing such a fine job in developing civilian aeronautics in this country and flying the Pacific in the well-known clipper ships.

I have been particularly interested in the subject of national defense, certainly for the last 23 years, and I regret that at a time like this when we are considering a bill calling for the expenditure of more than $1,000,000,000, relating to the very existence of our country, a large number of Members are not on the floor to participate in the discussion. There was a time a few short years ago when it seemed we were in danger of neglecting our national defense. Pacifist organizations, many of them very sincere, and other organizations with the desire to see the defenses of the United States weakened were getting in their work to such an extent that the Congress and the country were not paying the attention they should to this question and problem of national defense. This has all been changed within the past 2 or 3 years, as war has broken out abroad, and I think perhaps we have reached the point now where we have got to be sure that the pendulum does not swing too far in the other direction, that we do not appropriate too great sums of money for national defense. It seems to me it is the duty of our General Staff and our naval officers to bring to the Congress, to the Committees on Naval and Military Affairs, recommendations and suggestions that would enable us to provide for any eventuality that might arise. These experts of the Army and the Navy having pointed out to the Congress the actual and very remote possibilities of what might happen, it is then the responsibility of Congress to decide how far they wish to go in following the recommendations and suggestions of the War and Navy Departments. Once in awhile it is said on the public platform, and it has been intimated on the floor of this House, that the high commands of our Army and Navy have a desire to so expand these branches of our service as to create opportunities for promotion.

I think that is an unfair statement to make. I have confidence in the officers of our Army and Navy, believing that they sincerely try to present to the Congress the problem as they see it and that they make requests for what they think is necessary so that this country may be in position to protect itself.

When I returned home from the World War I vowed as one private citizen that I would do my best to see that never again would the conditions existent here in 1917 be allowed to exist at the outbreak of some future war; that never again would the young men of this Nation be drafted into the military service of our Army and sent into battle with such little training that they actually did not know how to load the rifle given to them, and that did actually happen in 1918. I have it on the authority of a fine friend of mine who served as a commissioned officer in one of the combat divisions, who told me that early one morning in making a tour of inspection he came across a young fellow who had been sent to that outfit as a replacement just about an hour before that unit was scheduled to go over the top. He had known this young man in civilian life and stopped to exchange greetings with him. The young fellow in response to his question as to how he was getting along said, "Fine; but I wish there was somebody around here to show me how to load this darn rifle before I go over the top." Such conditions should not be permitted to exist. I want to make sure that never again, if this country must defend itself, will our young men be called upon to fly in what has been properly termed "blazing coffins."

Now is the time to experiment, to carry on research, to acquire the very finest type of military aircraft that money can buy. Now is the time to establish a training program that will give us the military and naval pilots we may need in case we are subjected to an attack. At the present time we are in danger of having our building program develop so rapidly that we will not be in position to provide adequately trained pilots and properly equipped airports for this rapidly expanding air force for which we are providing in this bill.

During the congressional recess I had the opportunity to visit some of our military and naval stations in Panama. I was rather shocked to learn from a pilot stationed in Panama—in fact, from the commanding officer of one of the squadrons down there—that between October 8 and December 8 of this past year we had lost, either in Panama or en route to Panama, 10 military and naval pilots. It is interesting to note that every one of those 10 pilots who died either on his way to Panama or after reaching Panama was a Reserve officer called back into the active service. Men were sent down there to fly ships that were 100 to 150 miles an hour faster than they had ever flown before. The thought was expressed by that commanding officer—and I know those who are familiar with the subject agree with him—that no pilot should be permitted to fly a fast pursuit ship with less than a thousand hours in the air. We do not want to send men into mortal combat again in pursuit planes with only 35 or 40 hours of flying training and an inadequate ground schooling. At the time this Congress had the civil aeronautics training program before it we provided in the bill that at least 5 percent of the young men to be trained under this program should be selected from young men without college training. I offered that amendment and was happy to see it adopted. I have been interested to follow through and see how it worked, and I have learned recently that the Civil Aeronautics Authority is very well pleased with that provision; in fact, it would be perfectly willing, in view of its experience of the past few months, to have that 5 percent increased to 10 or even 15 percent. We have many young men in this Nation who have grown up since the development of aviation, who have played with model planes, who have built model planes, who have saved their pennies and have secured flying training. They are adequately equipped to enter not only the civil aeronautics courses but to go into our Army and Navy and secure flying training. I wish that the Army Air Service and those in charge of our naval aviation would give serious consideration to letting down a little bit on the requirement for flying training in the military and naval service. At this time, when that program is expanding so rapidly, it seems to me quite simple to segregate a group of possibly 100 or 200 student pilots selected from those without college training, put them through the regular military and naval courses, and learn from actual experience how their work compares with those that meet the strict requirements now in force by our Army and Navy. Several of our World War aces, men like Rickenbacker and Luke, never went to college.

I have referred to the danger, and I think it is a danger, that our building program will proceed so rapidly that we will not keep up with our personnel-training program. Reference has been made on this floor to the lack of airports along the Atlantic coast. I think everyone who has looked into this subject will agree that we have to start right now making adequate provision for these planes that we are building to land somewhere along the Atlantic coast. In connection with the development of our Air Corps nothing is more important than the procurement of aircraft and the training of pilots.

Last June, in fact, to be specific, on June 27, the gentleman from Illinois, Hon. RALPH CHURCH, addressed this House on the subject of transferring from the Atlantic and Pacific coasts to some inland point our munition and aircraft factories. A hasty reading of that address might well convince Members of the House that there was something to the idea, but I believe it is a move that should be very seriously considered before any such recommendations are made. Perhaps I have a selfish interest in this matter in that I have two or three of the larger units of the aircraft industry in my county. But I say to the members of the committee that if I honestly believed it would be to the advantage of our national defense to move the aircraft industry from Connecticut to, say, Illinois, I would very gladly vote to move that industry to Illinois. However, a careful examination of the facts, in my opinion, will convince any Member of the House that the suggestion is neither a practical one nor necessary.

Each Member of this House represents a constituency in the various States and we are all proud of certain achievements of the citizens and residents of our district and of our State. I know that the citizens of Connecticut would not for a moment think of trying to compete in raising wheat or corn with those residents who live in the Corn Belt and wheat-raising areas. While each part of this great Nation is particularly adapted to certain activities, agricultural or industrial, we feel that we have a certain peculiar qualification for the building of aircraft and the manufacture of fine tools in Connecticut.

In the first place, I do not believe that if the Government of the United States wanted to it could succeed in transferring the aircraft industry in Connecticut to, say, Illinois, because we know from experience that while it might be possible to move the machinery and some of the executives, the skilled mechanics who are working on these motors and on the aircraft, judged from past experience, would refuse to pull themselves away from their homes and move to another part of the country.

We saw that tried when the automobile industry was developing in this country. I was interested to learn recently that while we at one time had several automobile manufacturers in Connecticut they have since then moved to the great State of Michigan, but I find that the persons who then worked in those factories are still in Connecticut and still working in the same factories. They have simply turned their attention to new products and new equipment they can manufacture.

Our colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] in his remarks last June emphasized the danger of aerial attack on the aviation factories in this country. It may be interesting for the members of this committee to consider the fact that if we take the 10 most probable points of attack by air, that is, by the locating of an enemy airplane carrier, Chicago, Ill., is closer to the probable point of attack in 5 cases than is Hartford, Conn. To be sure Hartford, Conn., is equally near the probable point of attack in 5 other cases. I shall not mention the locations I have in mind as I believe we are on rather thin ice when we start to discuss points of attack on the United States, but taking the 10 most likely points of attack we find that they divide 50-50. We cannot put a great deal of weight in the suggestion that the East or even the Pacific coast is more likely to be subjected to attack from the air than is Illinois.

I have referred to the necessity of having skilled mechanics to manufacture and build our aircraft. Recently a manufacturer of national reputation employed a firm of industrial engineers to make a survey of several different parts of the United States with the view to building a new factory, the factory to be equipped to build a very necessary part of an aviation engine. This group of industrial engineers surveyed several States of the United States and then made their recommendation to the manufacturer who engaged them.

Among other things mentioned in the report was that the industrial engineers found that Connecticut has the largest supply, generally distributed, of skilled labor in the United States. The following shows for a number of States the number per square mile of workers in certain machine- and technical-product industries requiring skilled labor:

Per square mile

California	0.17
Connecticut	13.69
Illinois	1.58
Maryland	.25
Massachusetts	6.27
New Jersey	5.29
New York	1.53
North Carolina	.01
Ohio	2.10
Pennsylvania	1.66
Virginia	.02

This same firm of industrial engineers, having ascertained from experts on defensive tactics against aircraft the ideal type of territory to defend, stated in this report that of all the places studied in the plant survey, the central part of Connecticut appears to be closest to the ideal:

(a) There are a number of moderate-sized industrial cities. Hartford, the largest, has 170,000 population. (b) The country is generally wooded and hilly. (c) Motor roads radiate in all directions, affording ease of access and no transportation bottlenecks. (d) A number of the cities have relatively important industrial plants situated in their environs, warranting all-around antiaircraft protection. (e) Some of the cities are far enough from the coast line to be safe from landing raids, bombardment by naval guns, or unheralded attacks from carrier based planes. (f) A location in the environs of any of these moderate-sized cities would enable providing the plant with its own power, water, and sewage service.

I mention these figures simply to indicate that more is involved when we consider transferring either the aviation industry or any other munitions industry from its present point of location to a possible point in the Middle West. Further, we have no assurance and we have no reason to believe that if this country is ever subjected to an attack from the air, the attack will come from the North Atlantic or from the Pacific or from the Gulf of Mexico. While we have a very friendly neighbor to the north, we do not know what the years will bring and we do not know but that if we transfer these important industries from the Pacific coast or the Atlantic coast inland to, say, Illinois, we may not be putting them very close to the probable point of attack.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMASON. Does the gentleman know of anyone besides the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH] who is seriously considering such a proposal?

Mr. MILLER. I hope no one else is seriously considering it, but sometimes statements such as this are made and implanted, possibly, in the minds of members of committees. I know that some of our magazines have taken up the theme. I hope those who have the responsibility will not be carried away by the enthusiasm of a Member to attract a mighty fine industry to his district.

Mr. THOMASON. I believe the gentleman is attaching undue importance to the suggestion, because I do not believe anyone is seriously considering it besides the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MILLER. I hope not. Still you cannot blame him for wanting to attract such an industry to his district. I believe that as long as that point has been raised, I may be excused if I say that I am mighty proud of the men who make up our aviation companies in the State of Connecticut. I know the same is true throughout the United States.

Aviation has been referred to more than once as a young man's game. It is certainly a comparatively new industry. They have had the misfortune to have to make most of their development in a period when all industry has been suffering from depression. I have often wondered where that industry would be today if it had not had to contend with the depression that has been world-wide.

I referred some time ago to taking advantage of lessons that we learned during the World War. I hope that with that thought in mind I may refer to a matter I believe is important and is concerning many of our citizens. Certainly it is if I can judge from the mail I have received.

I would hate to see the United States follow the paths it followed between 1914 and 1917, particularly those paths that led to our involvement in the World War. Like most Members of Congress, I know only what I read in the paper, but I have read of the sending of our First Assistant Secretary of State to Europe as the personal representative of the President. It is only natural and reasonable that sending Mr. Welles on this mission is bringing to mind that we had a like experience during the World War, when President Wilson had an unofficial observer in the capitals of Europe. I hope the President or the State Department will see fit to set the minds of our people at ease and take them into his confidence, insofar as he can, and convince them that this is not a similar mission to that on which a special representative of President Wilson was sent in 1915 and 1916. And while I mention that subject, those of us who are interested in providing an adequate national defense are naturally interested in the development of our merchant marine, and we regret that it is necessary, in order to protect the best interests of the United States—at least, that was certainly the opinion of this Congress—to enact a neutrality law that took off of many of the seas our merchant marine; and while the activity of the merchant marine is curtailed, certainly it is doubly important that every possible support be given to those vessels of ours that are still traveling the high seas, and I regret that this special envoy of the President to whom I refer has seen fit to start on his mission and go to Europe traveling on a foreign vessel. I know the answer may be that the Manhattan was not due to sail for 4 or 5 days after he decided to sail for Europe, but if it was urgent that this special envoy get to Europe as quickly as possible, we have, flying the American flag, aircraft that would have gotten him over there in less than 36 hours, and I hope that in the future every representative of our Government and every one of our citizens who finds it necessary to go abroad, as patriotic citizens, will try to use the vessels of the United States merchant marine.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I will be very pleased to yield.

Mr. THOMASON. I am always very much interested in what my friend has to say on the subject of national defense, and I am in hearty accord with the suggestions he has made about the improvement of our own Army and Navy. I think we belong to the same school of thought, and that is that neither of us wants the largest army in the world, but we want the best; and in view of what the gentleman has to say about the need of more and better munitions and of a more adequate army as to personnel and as to housing, and, particularly, as to a strong air force, does not the gentleman think that, in view of the economy wave which seems to have struck Congress, we might well postpone any improvements at Guam until we have taken care of our own internal national defense, and until it is determined whether or not the Philippines are to have their freedom in 1946?

Mr. MILLER. If the appropriation carried in this bill was solely for the benefit of the Navy and for naval pilots, I would be willing to say I agree with the gentleman. I voted against this appropriation last year, frankly, under misinformation, as I now know; but I have been told on certainly reliable authority—and I think there is no secret about it, from the Civil Aeronautics Authority—that this is an important improvement if they are going to develop trans-Pacific flying.

Mr. THOMASON. Every appropriation bill that has come into this Congress has suffered very severe cuts. The gentleman has mentioned the merchant marine, which I think was unduly cut; and in view of what my friend and colleague from Texas [Mr. JONES], the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, had to say, agriculture has suffered more than any other branch of the Federal Government, in that it has been cut, I think he said, 51 percent. Now, if we must have cuts in these appropriation bills, including the appropriation for the War Department and likewise for the Navy Department, does not the gentleman feel that we had better use such money as we do appropriate for further national defense for the upbuilding of our Army here in the United States and Panama, Hawaii, and Alaska, and postpone the consideration of any improvements at Guam for the present, or even until it is determined whether or not the Philippines are to have their independence in 1946? Does not the gentleman feel that would be a wise policy in view of our economy program and the apparent demand for economy?

Mr. MILLER. I would be perfectly willing to vote to strike that item out of the bill in view of the fact that cuts have to be made and we have not had an opportunity to study the hearings. I do not know just how substantial the cuts are that have been made by the committee, but I will say this to the gentleman: In my enthusiasm for national defense I do not want to vote to appropriate a single unnecessary dollar. I think we have got to make these small cuts in order to acquire a large saving, and it is possible a study of the hearings and the bill itself will lead the House to believe that we can go further in cuts than the committee has gone.

Mr. THOMASON. It seems certain that we must have some cuts, and if we are to have any priorities, does not the gentleman think that we need to build up our own Army and its personnel, its equipment, its housing, its airports, its airplanes, the Navy planes and the Army planes, the fortifications at Panama, Alaska, and Hawaii, before we branch out in another venture in the Far East?

Mr. MILLER. I certainly do, and I commend to the gentleman the report prepared by a committee of the minority party, the chairman of which was our colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], in which he defined the territory that he felt we should be prepared to defend, and I may say that the island of Guam was well beyond the line of defense that he outlined in his report. To answer further the question which the gentleman has raised about providing for the Army and the Navy, I think the committee should be commended for the statement to be found on page 15 of the report, in which they point out that they have gone beyond the Budget estimates at least $200,000 in providing for our Naval Reserve. They recommend the building of experimental laboratories, and I think in that connection we could all give thought to increasing, not only numerically, but also the efficiency of our Reserve and the National Guard. It has been the policy of this country ever since the beginning to depend on the Organized Reserve, the old militia, the old State guard, and I hope that we can build up these Reserve forces and our National Guard before we go on and expand and develop a huge standing Army.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. GEYER of California. In view of the fact that the Budget makes quite a cut in the C. C. C. and in the N. Y. A. and the W. P. A. and increases the amount for defense, does it not seem to the gentleman that this is almost carrying out the slogan, "Guns instead of bread"?

Mr. MILLER. Of course I have not seen and do not think the gentleman has seen the appropriation bill making provisions for the C. C. C. or the W. P. A., but I have no desire to see the W. P. A. cut and will vote for the items recommended by the Budget.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. MILLER. To further answer the gentleman, I think the Members of the House would be much more enthusiastic in voting for increased appropriations for the C. C. C. if we could arrange to give them at least a minimum of military training while they are in the C. C. C. service.

Mr. GEYER of California. Of course, with that part I would not agree, but I do agree with everything else the gentleman has said about that.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH].

PURCHASE OF HUNTERS POINT, SAN FRANCISCO

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, pursuant to a provision in the naval public works authorization bill during the last session of Congress and now Public Law 106, the bill under consideration provides for an expenditure of $6,000,000 to purchase Hunters Point—$4,000,000 for the property and appurtenances and $2,000,000 for new improvements thereon.

The strategic importance of San Francisco Bay and Hunters Point has been stressed by the Navy Department on many occasions. Special commissions appointed by Congress have also stressed, from a national-defense standpoint, the importance of San Francisco Bay and Hunters Point.

Admiral J. W. Helm, who was senior member of a special commission appointed by Congress to select a site for a contemplated naval base on the southerly end of San Francisco Bay, made a report from which I quote, in part:

> San Francisco Bay is the only body of water on the Pacific coast south of Cape Flattery offering a safe anchorage from wind and weather to a large number of ships, which can be entered under all ordinary conditions of wind and sea.
>
> San Francisco Bay has ample anchorage with a good holding ground for a fleet of any size.

Admiral Charles F. Hughes, when Chief of Naval Operations, made the following statement:

> San Francisco Bay is, as you know, the principal harbor of the Pacific coast. To my mind, it belongs to the Nation; it is not the property of California nor of the cities that are on its shores. From its natural advantages and its location, San Francisco Bay is certain to be the major continental fleet base for any extensive campaign in the Pacific. It will be the point where the fleet will concentrate at the beginning of a war.

Admiral William D. Leahy, former Chief of Naval Operations, during the hearing on the naval authorization bill, also made the following statement:

> The program does not provide for a naval drydock in the San Francisco Bay area capable of taking a major capital ship. The privately owned drydocks at Hunters Point, lacking in the equipment necessary for repairs to our large war vessels, are not a satisfactory solution to the Navy's problem in time of war.

In my opinion, the Navy should acquire the Hunters Point drydocks and should provide weight-handling facilities, power connections, galley, latrines, storehouse, and an assembly plant to permit the overhaul of our largest vessels in conjunction with the Mare Island Navy Yard.

During this hearing Rear Admiral Moreell, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, supporting Admiral Leahy, also made a strong statement urging the purchase of Hunters Point.

At the last session of Congress a board was appointed by the Secretary of the Navy to investigate and report upon the need, for the purpose of national defense, of the acquisition of Hunters Point drydock. I quote from that report:

24. Studies of shipbuilding and drydock facilities, both naval and commercial, show that on the Pacific coast there are, at the present time, only one existing naval drydock and another under construction which will accommodate battleships and aircraft carriers. (Dock No. 3 at Hunters Point, which is a commercial dock, is not taken into consideration for reasons which will be made apparent in the next paragraph.) Both of these docks are located at the Puget Sound Navy Yard, Bremerton, Wash. In other words, in a coast line some 1,260 miles long, naval facilities for docking our capital ships exist at only one point; namely, the northern terminus of our coast line. Except during the summer months, operations of the fleet are carried on at least 1,000 or more miles to the southward of this point. This means, in effect, that for the greater part of the year any of our major ships requiring regular or emergency docking in naval docks must steam on the order of 2,000 or more miles. With excellent facilities available in the San Francisco Bay area such a procedure is economically unsound. Furthermore, it is illogical to presuppose that, in the event of a national emergency, concentration of all of our major ships would take place at only one point, and that point the most northern one, of our Pacific frontier. Thus, both from economic and strategic viewpoints, the establishment of a naval drydock capable of taking care of our capital ships in the San Francisco Bay area is fully warranted.

25. In the preceding paragraph no consideration has been given to utilization of the commercial drydocks at Hunters Point to care for at least a part of the docking needs of our major naval vessels. The reasons for not considering this, and all other commercial docks, are as follows:

(1) Security: Many of the intricate mechanisms which require repair and overhaul while a naval vessel is in drydock are of a secret or confidential nature and should not be open to general inspection by other than regular naval civil employees. This condition can very well be handled at a navy yard or station where all civilian employees have been inducted into the service under strict civil-service procedures and all activities are under rigid control. At a commercial plant such control would be an exceedingly difficult if not an impossible matter.

(2) Lack of specially trained workmen: The workmen employed at a commercial yard are normally fully familiar with routine overhaul work. However, the intricate and highly technical military equipment on a man-of-war requires specially trained personnel.

(3) Lack of adequate facilities: The power-length ratios of naval vessels are many times greater than those of commercial vessels and, as a consequence, the normal commercial yard does not have the shop capacity nor the weight-handling equipment which are essential for proper overhaul of naval vessels. As was pointed out in paragraph 4, the Hunters Point dock is lacking in even the minimum essential facilities for minor overhaul and the present owners have failed to provide these facilities on the ground that the income from their plant does not warrant the necessary expenditure.

(4) Lack of availability: Even though the use of a commercial dock is contracted for by the Government, there is no assurance that it will be fully available for naval vessels if necessity demands. Experience has indicated that in many instances commercial docking facilities have not been maintained in a condition suitable for instant use by naval vessels.

26. The Board has also given consideration to the practicability of equipping the Hunters Point drydocks with necessary facilities for work on naval vessels, the docks to remain in private ownership and to be operated as commercial facilities. The Board considers such an arrangement to be undesirable and impracticable if the Hunters Point docks are to be utilized for overhauls, as well as for interim dockings. In the foregoing paragraph reference is made to the need for security and the lack of specially trained workmen at commercial plants. In addition, if the fullest use is to be made of the Hunters Point docks, they should be operated as an annex to the Mare Island Navy Yard in order that the splendid shop facilities of that yard may be fully available. The coordination of the navy yard's work with activities of a commercial plant of the kind under consideration would be a difficult, time-consuming, and costly procedure. Furthermore, a very important consideration is the fact that under present conditions it has been impracticable to keep naval vessels in commercial docks for periods sufficient to permit proper drying out and painting because of the large docking charges. The Board of Inspection and Survey has repeatedly called attention to the insufficiency of the times spent in drydock and the resulting deterioration. If the docks are Government-owned, the vessels will undoubtedly be left in dock for longer periods with little additional cost.

27. The selection of a site for the construction of a naval drydock in the San Francisco Bay area will be governed, among others, by the following considerations:

(a) The size of the ship for which the facility is needed, particularly the draft.

(b) The dock's proximity to the present fully equipped Naval Establishment at Mare Island.

(c) Real-estate values at or near the site under discussion.

(d) Foundation conditions, particularly as regards their effect upon the cost of construction of a graving dock.

(e) As a corollary to (a), the depth and the width of the channel leading to the specific site.

28. In the entire San Francisco Bay area only three locations will satisfy the foregoing considerations to the extent that serious consideration should be given them for drydock construction, namely, Mare Island, Oakland-Alameda, and South San Francisco-Hunters Point.

29. The channel leading to Mare Island has a controlling depth of 30 feet and to increase and maintain an increased depth would prove inordinately expensive.

30. As regards a choice between the two remaining sites both have, or can be made to have, sufficient depth of water to permit access to them by battleships. The Hunters Point site, however, is more favorably situated in this respect since deep water is had immediately off-shore. Both sites are approximately the same distance from Mare Island. Real-estate values run about the same at both places. The main point of difference between the two sites lies in the drydock foundation conditions. These conditions are all in favor of the Hunters Point site and have made for much smaller drydock construction costs at that location. This one fact makes the element of total cost, including the purchase of existing facilities and the provision of such others as are necessary, for the establishment of naval docks in favor of Hunters Point and indicates its selection.

31. Information obtained by the Board from the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation indicates that during the period from January 1, 1937, to January 1, 1939, 76 commercial ships used these facilities, occupying them for an average of 176 dock-days per year. Of all the vessels utilizing the docks only six are of such dimensions that they cannot utilize other docking facilities in the San Francisco Bay area for their necessary overhaul. These six ships actually used the Hunters Point docks during the period mentioned above for an average of 20 days per year. Were these docks Navy-owned, provision could be made to permit their use for the routine docking and overhaul of the six commercial ships mentioned above.

The Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation, owners of Hunters Point drydocks, and the Navy Department have agreed on a purchase price of $3,993,572—the company to have use of the docks for a period of 3 years. In the meantime, if the money is made available, the Navy will proceed immediately with the very necessary improvements.

It should be borne in mind that at the present time the only drydocks on the Pacific coast large enough to accommodate major naval ships with adequate repair facilities are at Bremerton, Wash., 815 miles north of San Francisco Bay.

I do not claim to be an authority on naval defense, but as a Representative from the Pacific coast and a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine during the 15 years I have been in Congress, I have given serious consideration to national defense. Our Navy, which is the first line of national defense, consists of three links all of which are interdependent upon each other—the Navy, the merchant marine, and facilities for building, repairing, and docking ships.

For the first time since the World War, shipbuilding has been resumed on the Pacific coast, but facilities for docking and overhauling capital ships, referred to by Admiral Leahy, do not exist, with the exception of the one facility on Puget Sound.

This great land-locked harbor—San Francisco Bay—should be equipped with every modern facility necessary for national defense.

There should be no further delay in giving to the Navy the security which San Francisco Bay and Hunters Point afford as maintained by the naval authorities which I have quoted.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS].

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I think the pending appropriation bill, generally speaking, is a very good one and I think the committee is to be commended. They have done a splendid job. I have no quarrel with them. I think they have been as liberal as it is possible to be under the circumstances, which means that they have granted everything that can be constructed properly during the period for which they have appropriated. At the same time I think they have made no unreasonable cuts. I shall address myself now particularly to the question of Guam, about which there seems to be so much misunderstanding. In the first place the assumption is that this is launching into a new adventure in the Far East. Nothing could be further from the truth. Let us examine the facts. Guam has been in the possession of the United States for some 40 years. Guam has been occupied by the United States during that period. We have maintained a naval base there during practically all that entire period. We are using it today and we have been using it. We had an active squadron in Guam until about 1932. There was never any protest by Japan or by anybody else. I cannot see what difference it would make whether Japan protests or not. I do not believe there can be any very great sincerity behind a protest by Japan against our using or defending our own territory. Nobody has questioned our right to Guam or our occupancy of Guam. On the other hand Japan occupies a great many surrounding islands to which there is a great question as to the right of Japan to be there at all. They are the mandated islands, and under the mandate and by treaty Japan agreed not to fortify those islands, and we are all certain as a matter of fact that they are fortified. I do not think Japan is going to get very mad at us and go to war because we take out some coral heads in the island of Guam. What we are asking to do is not making the slightest change in our policy over what we have been doing for 40 years, which is to use the island of Guam both for the Navy and commercially. The Pan American Airways, which is an important commercial link with the Orient, uses Guam. It is one of their regular stations. That company has built an overnight hotel there. The increased size of the planes has made it dangerous to operate in Guam because of these coral heads. It is true that last year there was a proposal to spend $5,000,000 to dredge the harbor so as to be able to bring up seaplane tenders and build certain docks, and do shore construction in connection therewith. That is not involved in the present appropriation bill at all.

It is merely to remove the coral heads and make it possible to have proper sea runways for the planes which are using Guam and will continue to use it anyway. It is merely a question of whether you improve that harbor the same as you do any other harbor in the country when the size of ships increases and the traffic makes it necessary to improve the harbor.

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. With pleasure.

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. I would like to know, if that last statement is correct, why the Rivers and Harbors Committee does not bring in a bill to authorize an appropriation for the Island of Guam, and have the Appropriations Committee present it?

Mr. MAAS. Because that is not the proper legislative situation. This island is under the jurisdiction of the Navy and always has been. The Navy has authorization under proper law to do harbor dredging in the fourteenth naval district. The question of authorization is not involved in this at all. Nobody questions their authority to do this. It is merely a question of the appropriation with which to do it. The Rivers and Harbors Committee has nothing whatever to do with it. It is being presented in a perfectly legal and proper manner.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. Yes; I am glad to yield to my chairman.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Does the gentleman think that we need worry about Japan's protest? History shows that Japan likewise protested against the fortification of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. MAAS. Yes. They even protested against the individual who was sent to command the naval forces at Hawaii. I do not think we need worry about Japanese protests any more than they worry about our protests. They sunk the Panay and we protested, but they did not get very excited about it. They knew we were not going to war about it, and we know they are not going to war because we improve the island of Guam. All this talk about it being too far away and that we are dispersing our defenses and launching into a new policy is not in conformity with the facts. If it were possible for us to draw a line from the Aleutian Islands through Hawaii to Panama and say, "That is our sphere and we will never go beyond it, we are going to defend just that line," that would be fine, if we could do it. That is our defense line. We do not ever propose to permit any foreign hostile navy to cross that line, but we must have scouts out beyond that line in advance to know whether or not they are coming to that line before we can stop them at the line. Once they get to the line it will be too late to stop them.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. THOMASON. Does not the gentleman think that it is inconsistent to say that we are going to get out of the Philippines not later than 1946, and I heard some eminent gentleman say on the radio the other night in 1942—does not the gentleman think it is inconsistent to say that just as we are planning to get out of the Philippines, then we should begin to improve the island of Guam, which, of course, is the camel getting its nose under the tent, because later it means fortification and involvement in the Far East?

Mr. MAAS. No; I do not agree with the gentleman at all. I think the very fact that the gentleman states—that is, that we are going to get out of the Philippines—makes it imperative to improve the island of Guam.

Mr. THOMASON. Does not the gentleman think that we had better concentrate our national-defense activities here in our own country and our nearby possessions rather than going away out into the Pacific?

Mr. MAAS. Oh, the gentleman misunderstands the purpose of developing the harbor at Guam. We are not dispersing our defense forces at all; but in pursuing the subject about getting out of the Philippines, I have always in the past been opposed to giving up the Philippines. I was frank to say it was because I thought they would be of value to us and we could make some money out of them. We have done more for the Filipino people than any other nation has done for them in the history of the world. We promised them their independence. They are not going to get it. They are going to get something infinitely worse, in my opinion, than anything they have ever had in the past when they are cut loose. But they have been continually asking to be cut loose and I am now in favor of cutting them loose. But when we do cut them loose, it becomes doubly important that we develop Guam for ourselves, because the gentleman must realize that we are not a self-sufficient Nation. We are not even a self-sufficient hemisphere, unfortunately. The United States has to go to the Far East to get certain essential strategic raw materials, such as tin, rubber, tungsten, and chromium. Without those essential raw materials, peacetime industry in this country would collapse.

Mr. THOMASON. Well, granting all of that, the gentleman does not contend that we would have to send an army and navy over there to get it?

Mr. MAAS. Oh, you might have to. At least, be able to, potentially. The whole theory of your commerce is that we be able to protect our trade routes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. CALDWELL. Aside from the improvement as contemplated by this bill, which is in no sense military, it is absolutely essential to our peacetime activity, and I am wondering whether the gentleman agrees with me that if the United States asserted some degree of independence, if it asserted its own right to do as it pleases with its own property, that in itself would not be a step toward peace rather than toward war?

Mr. MAAS. I am satisfied the gentleman is absolutely right. I do not believe there is anything that would create more respect on the part of the Japanese for America than for us to say, "We are going to do as we see fit with our own territory."

Mr. THOMASON. Then if the gentleman is right, why not stay in the Philippines?

Mr. MAAS. As far as the Japanese are concerned, I would.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. SUTPHIN. I would like to ask my colleague from Florida a question. Perhaps he can tell us what our commerce amounted to last year.

Mr. CALDWELL. I said peacetime pursuits.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Well, that is commerce, is it not?

Mr. CALDWELL. I say that because Guam is midway between the Philippine Islands and Midway Island and is a necessary landing place for civilian airplanes.

Mr. SUTPHIN. I am told that the imports from Guam last year amounted to less than $75,000.

Mr. MAAS. I do not think the gentleman from Florida was even discussing the question of our trade with Guam. What he was stressing is the fact that Guam is an essential stopping point. Just as long as this Nation hopes to trade in the Orient at all, we must have trade routes. Aviation is becoming increasingly important in international trade. To continue it in the Orient, we have to have a stop at Guam.

Mr. CALDWELL. Or, to put it another way, I do not believe that America can ever have peace by tucking its tail between its legs and running every time anyone says that a particular line of activity offends him.

Mr. MAAS. Of course not; and anybody who has studied the Orient at all, or the oriental mind, knows that they interpret kindliness for cowardice and conciliation as weakness. I do not mean that we have to be ruthless, but certainly we have got to be ruthless in defending our own rights or we shall have the respect of no one, least of all the orientals.

From the standpoint of the Pan American Airways operations, they are making a very valuable contribution to our commercial life. They would have to suspend operations if there were not some place in the approximate location of Guam where they could make a stop, for in their present state of development our planes today have not sufficient range to make the jump from Hawaii to the Philippines. Until 1946, at least, the Philippines are ours, and until that time we will maintain naval forces in the Philippines. We have a squadron of patrol planes in the Philippines now. These planes have to come back to Hawaii for overhaul. They have to have a stop approximately where Guam is to make the trip to and from the Philippines. We are going to continue this policy for the next 6 years at least, and we are going to have this squadron and maybe more squadrons over there. Incidentally, Japan has not gone to war with us for keeping a squadron of patrol planes in the Philippines, which is just as close to Japan as Guam is; and I do not believe Japan is going to go to war with us over Guam, no matter what we do in Guam. Japan fears that we are going to try to interfere with her plans in China. I do not believe we are going to interfere with her plans in China. I do not believe that our trade in China would justify our participating in an oriental war at all, and we will not have to if we make clear to Japan that we are going to defend ourselves and our own interests and our right to essential raw materials, but will let her alone in her own sphere. Under such a policy I do not think we would have any trouble with Japan at all. But should we have trouble, Guam, in my opinion, is the only alternative to a two-ocean navy.

The ideal defense of this country would be two fleets, because we are a two-ocean nation. I do not believe we are going to have two fleets, although personally I am an advocate of it. I do not, however, believe that our national economy is such that we can afford it—at least we cannot afford two navies at the present time. If ever we are threatened, it is going to be in both oceans at the same time. No one single nation is going to be foolhardy enough to attack the United States or its essential interests alone, but a possible coalition of European and oriental powers would be a very serious threat to us because we have only one fleet. Regardless, however, of where our fleet might be, in my opinion, if we were threatened in both oceans at the same time, that fleet would be put in the Atlantic. Since we have only one fleet, and it would not be feasible to split the fleet, it is going to go into the Atlantic, because 75 percent of the population and of the industrial structure of this Nation is in the Northeast. Draw a line from Chicago to Norfolk. Everything northeast of that has got to be defended first. We would simply have to risk the consequences in the Pacific if we were threatened in both oceans at the same time in order to protect the northeast sector first.

But, Mr. Chairman, if we develop the harbor at Guam—of course, if it were fortified it would be a thousand times better; we can maintain patrol squadrons there—let me point out just what this will mean to us. It might even mean the difference between victory and defeat; certainly it could mean the difference between a long and disastrous war and a short, victorious war.

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. When Admiral Leahy was before the committee and we were talking about Guam, as I recall, I asked him this question: "Suppose Guam were fortified. In case of an invasion by the Japanese, how long could Guam hold out, having spent $90,000,000 or $100,000,000?" as were the figures at that time proposed.

He said, "Congressman, I think Guam could hold out possibly 3 weeks."

How much defense would that be?

Mr. MAAS. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I think he said from 3 weeks to 3 months.

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. I am certain that he said 3 weeks. The gentleman will find it in the record.

Mr. MAAS. Possibly the admiral is mistaken, or was misunderstood. That could happen.

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. He may have been.

Mr. MAAS. I may say to the gentleman that I have been in Guam and I have made a military study of it. If it were fortified, we would be absolutely invincible, and, in my opinion, we would be immune from attack in either ocean. I say that because if we were threatened in the Atlantic our fleet could proceed to the Atlantic, meet the threat in the Atlantic, engage the enemy fleet until it had destroyed the coalition fleet in that theater of operation. In the meantime, the Japanese would never proceed beyond Guam until it had first reduced it. No fleet commander would ever dream of leaving a fortified base between his home port and the operating fleet. To do so would be suicide, both for his home country and for his fleet. If the Japanese, in fact, proceeded to Panama, to Hawaii, or the Aleutian Islands and left Guam still fortified and as an operating base, our forces could immediately proceed from Guam to cut off communications and supplies between the Japanese fleet and Japan. We could then proceed to destroy their fleet at will, in the meantime wreaking terrific destruction in Tokio and on all of Japan. So no naval commander would move his fleet beyond Guam, if it were fortified, and if it were fortified it would take a major naval operation to reduce it. It would take at a minimum 3 months to reduce Guam if it were fortified. In that time our fleet could dispose of the enemy in the Atlantic, return to the Pacific, and then meet the Japanese fleet under the most favorable conditions to our own fleet.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I would like to ask a question for my own information. I am entirely ignorant of military maneuvers. I want to view this thing right. I may say that I voted against fortifying Guam the last time this matter was up and if I did wrong I want to correct the wrong. The gentleman has said that the necessity for fortifying Guam is that an admiral of the Japanese Navy, having a desire to attack the west coast of the United States, would not dare do so and leave behind him, after he moved eastward, a fort or a fortification of some sort. Why would they do that anyway with the intervening fortifications that we have in the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. MAAS. The gentleman must realize that there is a vast difference in your points of radius from Guam and Hawaii. Guam is close enough to Japan so that planes based there can immediately observe the movement of the Japanese fleet. It cannot get beyond Guam without being detected from Guam. On the other hand, it could go to the Aleutian Islands or Panama and avoid Hawaii entirely. More important than that is this: Even if we fortify Guam, or do just what we are going to do by this bill, we will continue to use it, anyway. If we do not do what is provided in this bill, we will have to spend more money than the cost of this dredging in replacing planes that will get cracked up over there in Guam. We are going to use Guam all the time. We are going to use it every day, and we will continue to use it. If we do nothing else but make the harbor at Guam adequate for patrol planes that in itself would be of infinite value to this Nation in case we are threatened. Let me explain to the gentleman why that is. I am talking now about an unfortified Guam. We are operating patrol planes through there now, and we undoubtedly will operate patrols in Guam if the situation necessitates. Patrol planes radiating out of Guam can keep the Japanese Navy under surveillance all the time. The Japanese Navy could not move in any direction without the high command of our Navy knowing it through our scout planes operating out of Guam. We could not get that information out of Hawaii until they had already gotten too far, perhaps, for our Navy to intercept them. But Guam is close enough to Japan so that the first movement of the Japanese Navy will be detected by our pilots and radioed to our fleet commanders, so that if they start in any direction toward a vulnerable spot in our defense system our fleet will know it and the distance necessary to intercept them will be shorter for our Navy than it is for their Navy to get to a vulnerable point.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I would like to ask one more question. As I understand the gentleman, this appropriation is intended only for the purpose of making Guam a place at which airships may land and take off?

Mr. MAAS. That is correct.

Mr. MASSINGALE. It does not contemplate any kind of a haven or harbor for any sea ships?

Mr. MAAS. No; it does not. The bill last year provided that, but the present bill does not so provide.

Mr. THOMASON. Does not the gentleman think that is what it will lead to though? Is that not what the gentleman favors?

Mr. MAAS. Oh, I personally favor that; yes.

Mr. THOMASON. Does the gentleman not think when this appropriation is made it will not be long until somebody will be asking Congress to fortify Guam?

Mr. MAAS. The Congress has control of it. If the occasion arises when that should be done, and it is recommended, the gentleman would be the first one to vote for it, if it is found to be necessary.

Mr. THOMASON. Well, it is inconsistent to be getting out of the Philippines in the next 5 years and at the same time doing something that will lead to the fortification of Guam. I say that is inconsistent.

Mr. MAAS. We will not fortify Guam unless it becomes essential, and if it is essential to our national interest to fortify Guam, we will do so.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Did I correctly understand the gentleman to say there are flying activities at Guam every day at the present time?

Mr. MAAS. Not in a strict sense every day. I meant it is in use and available every day.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Who is using it?

Mr. MAAS. Pan American and our own Navy.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Our own Navy? To what extent?

Mr. MAAS. Whenever it is necessary to fly back and forth from the Philippines.

Mr. SUTPHIN. The gentleman knows that when the P–13 squadron went out there the fleet was on the west coast. That was last September, and that was their last activity out of Guam. This is February.

Mr. MAAS. But they have to come back for overhaul from time to time, and for training.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Those 12 planes were through there in September.

Mr. MAAS. Yes. Pan American is using it constantly. The gentleman knows it.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Yes; every day.

Mr. MAAS. The gentleman also knows that we maintained an active squadron of the Marine Corps there for many years without any protest from Japan.

Mr. SUTPHIN. We do not maintain it there at the present time.

Mr. MAAS. No; it does not happen to be there at the present time, partly because of the difficulty of operating out of there with those coral reefs.

Mr. SUTPHIN. That marine squadron had land planes.

Mr. MAAS. No; they had both. I was over there when they were there.

Mr. SUTPHIN. How many planes did they have?

Mr. MAAS. They had half a dozen amphibians. They had land planes and amphibians.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Was it 50-50, then?

Mr. MAAS. I do not know how many they had; 12 or 14 land planes and half a dozen amphibians.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLMER. The gentleman spoke of using this island as a scouting base. Would this be practical without being able to back it up? In other words, unless the island were fortified there would be no occasion for scouting.

Mr. MAAS. No; I believe the gentleman is mistaken about that. It would be of tremendous value, even if it were not fortified, for scouting. Let me say to the gentleman that if we were operating with our scout planes, the minute we saw the Japanese Navy moving in our direction that information would be reported back to the fleet commander, and the scouting squadrons located at Guam would immediately drop back to Hawaii; but it would have served its purpose of warning our fleet.

Mr. COLMER. The point I am making is that unless the island were fortified those planes would be useless. Japan would not let them operate out of there, assuming that we were engaged in hostilities with Japan.

Mr. MAAS. If we were engaged in hostilities we would not operate out of there if Guam were not fortified. The thing is that it would be the first warning of any move toward hostilities.

Mr. COLMER. What would we want to be scouting the Japanese fleet for if we were not engaged in hostilities?

Mr. MAAS. We want to know before they start hostilities. Japan does not declare a war, it just starts making war, and we want to know as far in advance as possible of any threatened danger.

Mr. COLMER. Do I correctly understand the gentleman to mean that if the Japanese fleet were to move in the direction of Guam on a practice cruise we would want to be notified of it?

Mr. MAAS. If a critical situation existed, as it may be getting to be now, you bet your life we would want to know it. We do not want the first knowledge of it to be some shells falling on Los Angeles, for instance, or the destruction of the Panama Canal.

Mr. COLMER. Does the gentleman contend it would be worth anything from a military standpoint to this country to have this improvement of Guam made unless we followed it up with the expenditure of the $800,000,000, or whatever it is, to fortify the island?

Mr. MAAS. It is not any $800,000,000, in the first place; it is $80,000,000. Or if you wanted to make a complete Gibraltar out of it the cost would be $250,000,000; but it would be the cheapest $250,000,000 this Government ever spent. It is essential that the United States retain and develop Guam to protect our trade routes to the Dutch East Indies and the Malay States, where we get the bulk of our absolutely indispensable raw materials of tin and rubber as well as other strategic materials. So I am in favor of developing the harbor of Guam, whether we fortify the island or not. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

CHAIRMAN MADDEN, OF THE LABOR BOARD, GUILTY OF "UNFAIR PRACTICES," SHOULD BE GIVEN A DOSE OF HIS OWN MEDICINE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, the Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, Mr. Madden, has been guilty of "unfair practices," if not a violation of the Federal statutes. A dose of the medicine which he has been handing out to so many employers throughout the country would not be a bad thing for him.

He has been finding that employers who told their employees, some of whom had worked in the factory for 20 or 25 years, that they need not pay dues or join an organization in order to hold their jobs, were guilty of unfair labor practices. No court as yet has upheld that theory. A circuit court of appeals on the Pacific coast has said that, if the law were construed that way, it would be a denial of free speech. Nevertheless, the Board, since that decision was rendered, has continued to make that same finding against free speech.

Then, too, as we all know, the Supreme Court held as long ago as April of 1937, that an employer need not enter into a written contract or into any contract at all with employees. We can go back further than that. We can recall that, when the law was passed, the Senate committee, in its report bringing the bill to the floor, said the law did not require the making of an agreement. We recall that Senator WAGNER himself, in a letter to the New York Sun in November of 1935, said the law did not require the making of a contract or the signing of a contract.

Nevertheless, Mr. Madden has held that the employer must sign a contract, which is contrary to the decision of the Supreme Court and to the decision of more than one circuit court of appeals.

The Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, Mr. Madden, has been proceeding on the theory that it is a part of his duty, a part of the duty which he owes to the United States and for the performance of which he receives money appropriated by Congress, to enact or to prevent the enactment of legislation.

Chairman Madden completely forgets that he is not charged with the enactment of legislation. He forgets that it is the duty of Congress to legislate, that it is the duty of the courts to interpret that legislation, and that it is the duty of those boards and agencies of the Federal Government, which are created by the Congress or by Executive order to administer those laws, not to enact them or to change them.

He forgets that there is a Federal statute on the books which makes it a criminal offense for anyone to use, directly or indirectly, funds appropriated by Congress to pay for personal services or incur expense to influence Members of Congress to favor or oppose legislation.

Mr. Madden, acting as Chairman of the Labor Board, has been very quick to condemn employers, to find them guilty of a violation of the National Labor Relations Act. He has set himself up on a throne, from which he has criticized not only the acts but the motives of those employers who still believe that this is a free Government; that the right of free speech and a free press guaranteed by the Federal Constitution has not been abrogated.

He has condemned, both by his decisions and by his public utterances, those who have ventured to disagree with his construction of the National Labor Relations Act. He has made some very arbitrary and unjust decisions. He has gone so far as to create a situation where employees, who are guaranteed the right of collective bargaining by section 7 of the act, are by his decisions actually deprived of that right.

As long as Chairman Madden presumes to sit in judgment not only over the acts of employers but on their motives, it is well that we call his attention to some of his own shortcomings. It is well that he be asked publicly whether it is not true that he has violated section 201 of title 18 of the Criminal Code of the United States. It is well that we ask him whether his own testimony before the Smith committee does not convict him of such a violation.

Having received his answer, it is well that we throw back into his teeth the statement that he has deliberately, willfully, and for the purpose of maintaining and extending his authority, employed his time, paid for by money appropriated by Congress to prevent amendment to the N. L. R. A. and that his conduct, many think, is in violation of section 201.

Here are the facts, and there is no dispute, for the testimony comes from the mouth of Chairman Madden.

Let me quote the statute; but before doing that, let me give you an illustration of how much truth there is in the testimony of Mr. Madden—and I want to give it to you from his own testimony and not from what somebody else has said.

He said this—I am reading from page 678 of the hearings before the Smith committee under date of February 8, 1940:

> The charge on page 22 of Senator BURKE'S statement that the Board appointed a trial examiner "who had written and published a book on the C. I. O. lauding that organization in the most glowing terms" is erroneous.

Now, get this; the other was preliminary:

> The facts are that the Board designated Prof. J. Raymond Walsh, or the Harvard faculty, on a temporary per diem basis, to hear the Heinz case—

And then he goes on and says that after he had learned that Walsh's appointment had been criticized; that after the hearing in which Walsh was then engaged had ended, Walsh was told that his services would not be needed longer.

He testified in substance before the Senate committee that Walsh was only a temporary employee. Let us get the record. The record from the personnel files of the Board, referring to Prof. J. Raymond Walsh, reads—pages 678 and 679 of the Smith committee hearings, under date of February 8, 1940:

> Born in the State of Wisconsin, resident of the State of Massachusetts at the time of appointment. He was assigned as a trial examiner to the Empire Furniture Co. case, the Weirton Steel Co. case, the West Virginia Pulp & Paper Co. case, and the H. T. Heinz case.

Madden either did not know or he did not care what his own files showed when he gave that testimony. I submit that when you come to weigh testimony of these Labor Board employees you ought to have a little of their background and know something about previous statements, which they have made before you swallow everything they have said.

Here is section 201 of title XVIII, Criminal Code of the United States:

> Use of appropriations to pay for personal service to influence Members of Congress to favor or oppose legislation: No part of the money appropriated by any act shall, in the absence of express authorization by Congress, be used directly or indirectly to pay for any personal service, advertisement, telegram, telephone, letter, printed or written matter, or other device intended or designed to influence in any manner a Member of Congress to favor or oppose, by vote or otherwise, any legislation or appropriation by Congress, whether before or after the introduction of any bill or resolution proposing such legislation or appropriation; but this shall not prevent officers and employees of the United States from communicating to Members of Congress, on the request of any Member of Congress, through the proper official channels, requests for legislation or appropriations which they deem necessary for the efficient conduct of the public business.

Then it provides:

> Any officer or employee of the United States who, after notice and hearing by the superior officer vested with the power of removing him, is found to have violated or attempted to violate this section, shall be removed by such superior officer from office or employment. Any officer or employee of the United States who violates or attempts to violate this section shall also be guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

Congress wrote the National Labor Relations Act; it created a Board and the President appointed Mr. Madden as Chairman of that Board. Mr. Madden is charged with the duty of administering the law. Mr. Madden, as Chairman of the Board, has not one single thing to do with the enactment of the law of the amendment or the law or with any attempt to repeal the law. Mr. Madden is not content to be investigator, prosecutor, judge, jury, and executioner under the National Labor Relations Act.

Mr. GROSS. I was just going to add that word—executioner is right.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is what he is, and in addition to that he wants to add to his functions as Chairman of the Board the right to tell the Members of Congress that we should not amend the law, and he does that in violation of that statute, does he not? Judge for yourselves whether he does or does not. I am not trying to say or to give a statement of what Mr. Madden does or of what he did with reference to that statute. I shall read to you what he did, his own statement of what he did. Here it is by question and answer, questions by Mr. Toland and answers by Mr. Madden, on February 8, 1940, before the Smith committee (p. 678 of the hearings):

Q. Now, let me ask you this question, Mr. Madden. Do you have any recollection of trying to incite unions connected with the American Federation of Labor or labor leaders to appear before the Senate Committee on Education and Labor in opposition to amendments to the Wagner Act?—A. Yes; I have some recollection. I would not adopt your term.

Let me pause there for a moment.

Mr. Madden is charged with administering this law impartially and fairly, and he steps out of character, and attempts to incite—oh, he objects to that word—he advises, some of the officials of the unions, like Dubinsky's, and members of the A. F. of L. to go against the A. F. of L. organization leaders, which, of course, they have a right to do. He also advises them to appear before the Congress and oppose amendments to the law. Does he use Federal money? He sends out communications, or his Board sends out communications, and if they are franked and do not need postage, the paper at least costs something. Does he not send them out in violation of that Federal statute—this man who said that the employer may not even say to the boy or girl who works in a factory that they need not pay tribute to work there—this man says that such a statement is an unfair labor practice, and condemns the employers for that, and then if they are guilty of that and men cease work, he orders a reinstatement of these men and the payment to them of back wages. That is what this man Madden does in violation of that statute. He lobbies to induce Congress to refuse to amend the law and he endeavors to incite members of a union to oppose a course advocated by their leaders. What kind of an Administrator is that? Is it not enough that the American Federation of Labor has charged him with bias and prejudice? Must we retain him longer? Must we still keep on the books an act which is unfair and retain a Board, a member of which lobbies in violation of a Federal statute?

Here is some more of his testimony:

Q. Let us strike out the word "incite." Let us say that you sought their assistance.—A. I have a recollection that I invited David Dubinsky to appear before the Senate committee.

What would you think of a judge, or what would you think of a man at the head of a committee, even though it is not a judicial committee, but who is charged with sitting there fair and impartial, holding the scales of justice, sending out to have witnesses come in to testify in behalf of what the judge thought we ought to have? Is it true that this Congress is not competent, is not able to enact legislation? Must we submit to lobbying on the part of the chairman of a board who is presumed to be exercising judicial functions?

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Has the gentleman ever heard tell of a Federal judge appearing before a legislative committee of Congress for the purpose of having certain legislation enacted?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Personally I have not, but I know of no reason——

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. May I inform the gentleman that as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary it was my privilege during the last session of Congress to have some of the ablest Federal judges in the United States appear before that committee and advocate the passage of legislation?

Mr. HOFFMAN. That has no application to this case. Mr. Madden appeared before the Senate and House committees and before the House special committee. That is proper enough. But that is an entirely different thing than using Federal money to induce others to advocate or oppose legislation which he is employed to administer. There is another thing that does not put Mr. Madden in that class, and that is his bias and prejudice and his evident sympathy for and acts in behalf of one organization as against the other; nor does the practice change the law in any respect. I know nothing about what these Federal judges have done, but the fact that some Federal judge did something does not make it proper; and I do recall that not long ago a Federal judge somewhere in these United States had the robes stripped from him, and that is what I am advocating should be done about Mr. Madden.

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I think not. The gentleman can get all of the time he wants here in this debate. To continue with the testimony:

Q. Do you have any recollection as to any other labor leader?

A. I don't; it may have happened, but I have no recollection of any other.

Q. Do you have any recollection of seeing any correspondence that was sent out to regional directors asking them to see what they could do to get American Federation of Labor unions to oppose the American Federation of Labor amendments?

A. Well, I am not sure whether I saw any of that correspondence. I have no doubt that there may have been some.

What business have the employees of the Labor Board lobbying against or for amendments, as long as that statute remains on the books?

Those questions and the answers to those questions disclose that Chairman Madden, forsaking his position as administrator of the law, sought to become a creator of legislation, a preserver of legislation; that he not only sought to do this himself, but that, using time paid for by Federal appropriations, he besought others to lobby toward the same end.

The testimony shows that he attempted to influence members of the American Federation of Labor to revolt against their leadership and to appear before a committee of the Senate in opposition to amendments to the National Labor Relations Act.

Chairman Madden is not an impartial administrator. He is not an impartial judge. He is an advocate. He is an assistant to the C. I. O. He is a lobbyist. He is a lobbyist whose time is paid for by appropriations made by Congress. Is there any reason why he, who is so ready to condemn employers, who many times innocently violate the law, should not be subject to the law? Why not give him an application of his own methods? Why not let him appear before a jury of his peers and answer to the charge that he has violated the criminal statute of the United States?

That Mr. Madden did not act inadvertently when he indulged in this improper conduct, when he became a lobbyist, is further shown by the questions asked him by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROUTZOHN], and the answers of Mr. Madden, which will be found beginning on page 699 of the Smith hearings, under date of February 8, 1940:

A. * * * We have regarded ourselves, although our people have jobs out of this enterprise, and are to that extent interested in it, in addition to that, as trustees of this enterprise for the benefit of those who are to be protected by this law.

Q. Is there anything in the law which indicates that you are the trustees of the law itself?

A. I think any public official whose duty it is to enforce a law for the protection of people is a trustee of that law for those people.

Q. And you think that that justified you in doing something that was an inappropriate thing, that is, soliciting something from those who had to deal with you week in and week out throughout the administration of this act?

A. Well, that was our justification for it, Congressman.

Q. What do you think about it at this time, having given it some consideration? Do you think that that was the proper thing to do?

A. I am inclined to think that if we were in a situation where some congressional action were about to be taken on 24 hours' notice so that the people who are the real beneficiaries of this act would not even be aware that there was a problem before Congress by the time that this problem was to be decided, I am inclined to think that we would tell them that that problem was up.

Q. Mr. Madden, didn't you take into consideration, if you were considering it at all—that is, the propriety of what you were doing—that you had a friendly administration, and that that administration had a fairly good sized majority in the Congress, and it, itself, could take care of that for you?

A. Well, the situation was that the Appropriations Committee of this friendly administration had made an adverse report in which they had cut our funds to the point of destruction, and that even after our effort in lobbying it was a rather narrow squeak by which we got the money.

Q. Let's work this down to the last analysis. Did you get the money?

A. Yes.

Q. Did it come through your efforts or did it come through the efforts of the administration? Which had the most influence?

A. Well, that time I think what we did was needed.

Q. At that time you thought it was needed, is that it?

A. Yes.

The point I am trying to make is this, that all through the activities of this Board—and you will find plenty of illustrations if you will run through the hearings of the Smith committee—runs the theory that the members of the Board are charged with the duty of forcing all workers into a labor organization. That is what is back of it all. Not only that, but if you will go a little further in these hearings, you will find in the record of February 8, 1940, where Mr. Witt, secretary of the Board, with the sanction and approval of Mr. Madden, sent out to regional directors throughout the country a letter of instruction, written by Lee Pressman, attorney for the C. I. O., advocating the practice of reducing the complaints as much as possible. That was for the purpose of charging one single act, on which an order of the Board holding that the employer was guilty of unfair labor practice might be based; then get a general, widesweeping order of the Board to cease and desist, and you have a blanket order against the employer. If ever in the future that employer is guilty of an unfair labor practice, prohibited by the general terms of the order, then you could bring that employer before a Federal court, in a contempt proceeding, without a hearing before the Board, for the violation of that order of the Board, which may have been issued on just one narrow, insignificant charge and conviction. And the employer would have no opportunity to get out of the trap in which he had been caught.

In March of 1939, I introduced a bill, which, if passed, would insure to employees the right to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing—a right which the present act does not in practice always give them, but which it was supposed to protect. The Supreme Court has said at least once and the Circuit Courts of Appeals more than once that the act, as administered, sometimes did not permit employees to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing.

So now we have come down to the time when the A. F. of L. admits, in the interest of fair play, that the act should be amended. We have come down to the time when not only the employers, but the public generally admits that the act should be amended.

How much longer are we going to sit here without acting? Are we going to wait for the Smith committee? We do not know when they will report. They are doing a wonderful job, but they cannot disclose any fundamental principles which are being disregarded, of which we are not now aware. Are we going to wait for the House Labor Committee? One member of the Smith committee asked me if the regular House Labor Committee was holding a side show. I was unable to enlighten him. That committee held hearings during the last regular session. They were here during the special session. Is it the policy of this body to let those two committees go on indefinitely and then, when the summer has rolled away and autumn comes along, to turn about and send, late in the session, a bill to the Senate when we know we are not going to get any action?

Speaking, if I could—and I cannot—only as a Republican with political ideas in mind, I would say, "If you of the majority keep that Wagner law just as it is, refuse to make it fair and just, you will give us some of the best political ammunition for the next campaign that we could get anywhere." Speaking as an American, who believes in fair play; speaking as a Representative who has a duty to the people who sent me here, I would say, "Let us get about our business and amend the National Labor Relations Act so as to make it fair." Oh, yes; I see the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK], a true friend of labor; even he recognizes today that the Board's conduct has been rotten; that you have got to have a board with membership of five, as the gentleman said in the beginning, and that you have got to make the law fair and just, and the Board judicial.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. My time has just expired.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. PATRICK. I just wanted to ask, since we have clothed the Smith committee with the authority and have given it the time and money to make this investigation along the lines discussed by the gentleman, whether we had better get all the facts we can before undertaking the sort of legislation recommended by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That Smith committee has been doing a wonderful job. They have disclosed a mess that stinks to high heaven, but if we wait for the Smith committee to disclose all of the bias and prejudice and iniquities of the Labor Board, we will wait here until we meet again in some other session. There is no question about that.

Mr. PATRICK. Does not the gentleman feel that if we wait for that Smith committee to make its report, we will make a law then too strong for him to support?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Oh, that is just a silly, foolish question.

Mr. PATRICK. Oh, of course. [Laughter.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL].

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to speak for a brief moment concerning the National Youth Congress.

Long accustomed to the legal philosophy that all persons and all organizations are entitled to the benefit of all doubts, and that regardless of things derogatory or detrimental said of or about them they are presumed to be innocent until proven guilty. When many weeks ago it was said this organization was communistically inclined and other prominent folks said that it was not, I had no opinion, for I had no evidence. But I want to say that the demonstrations which we have had and the evidence which has been disclosed in the past week should no longer leave any doubt in any man's mind that the organization has not only within its ranks Communists, but that the ultimate aim is that these Communists shall control and direct its movements, if you take an organization by what it does as well as what it says.

In the first place, there is not any organization in America of any discretion that would object to a resolution being placed before it to purge it of Communists, unless it had Communists within its ranks. Such mere refusal is equivalent to pleading guilty. Or, take again an organization that is so impolite, whether it be made up of youth or mature folks, as to boo its own invited speakers, as to follow the unparliamentary procedure of forcibly ejecting one of its members from the audience, a member who wanted to introduce a resolution, instead of tabling the resolution in the parliamentary manner, or voting it down, if they saw fit; an organization that would visit the galleries of Congress and hiss Members in the disorderly manner that they did—these three things show that regard for recognized procedure has very little place in their mode of doing things. [Applause.]

Yes; I recognize, as some have said, that they are proceeding under the Bill of Rights. Yes; the Bill of Rights that they flaunt so gallantly. But what bill of rights or its equivalent is in operation in communistic Russia? And if the Communists of America should assume control, then how long would that blessed Bill of Rights be in use and in practice by the same ones who are now holding it up as one of their constitutional rights? How long would the right of constitutional trial by jury and the presumption of innocence and the regularity of procedure be followed? How long would it be until we would revert to the firing squad of Russia?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CREAL. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Now that the gentleman has made his criticism of the procedure and various activities of the American Youth Congress, will the gentleman tell us what his idea is with regard to the program that these young people have set before Congress and their appeal that Congress do something with regard to the 4,700,000 young men and women who are out of work and without opportunity of education?

Mr. CREAL. I have voted for the N. Y. A. programs of the past few years, I will say to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CREAL. That, however, was a different organization and must not be confused, as probably it is confused by a great many, with the National Youth Congress. But as to the program to which the gentleman refers, I would not be influenced to be more for it by reason of being asked by Communists to support it. They do it harm and no good; and I say to the gentleman from New York that as long as Communists are in that organization, they are making one devil of a mess of attempting to advance a program. Communists will do them 10 times more hurt than help.

But if we were to have a program sent to Congress by an organization which has sent the Communists out of it, if the program were asked in the name of Americanism, it would awaken much more sympathetic consideration in the Members of Congress.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CREAL. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Would the gentleman delay any handling of the youth problem until the American Youth Congress has expelled the Communists? Is that the gentleman's viewpoint?

Mr. CREAL. I have no objection to saying that I would not oppose anything that was good for the country that was advocated by somebody, regardless of how much I disliked their general affiliations; I would not oppose anything that was good. But I may say that I would not be induced one particle to favor it because it had a certain amount of Communists within it; and I want to say that when it is known that Communists are in the organization, the overwhelming majority of this House of the Congress would not be inclined to look favorably upon it. These organizations do themselves no good by having Communists help advocate their programs.

Does that answer the gentleman's question as to my position?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. CREAL. I think those who are within that organization will continue the effort to purge that organization of the Communists within it, or else withdraw and form an organization composed of people who are not Communists. We look with more or less lethargy and disinterest on this so-called "red" talk, but when you come to invade the youth of America, there is a different issue involved. I am not very much afraid of the bewhiskered, wild-eyed Russian trying to influence the older people, but when you invade the youth and try to entice them into something by statements that you are going to give them jobs and big things, that is the most dangerous thing I have ever heard discussed with reference to the activities of the "reds" during the 5 years I have been a Member of this Congress. When they said 10,000 would come back here next year, most of those will be Communists; the other people will have gone if they cannot purge the organization.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, it may be true that there is only a small percentage of Communists in there, but does the gentleman believe that nine Americans will ever be able to convert one Communist radical to the American point of view? It is a ravenous, poisonous, dangerous disease that inflicts itself upon certain people who are already partly afflicted mentally and further deranged by the disease when it lights on them. One of these nine might perhaps to some extent influence the others, but the nine will never convert a single Communist to one single idea of American procedure and American ideals.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CREAL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does not the gentleman believe that the best guarantee against any "ism" is for this Congress to do something about the youth unemployment problem, particularly in view of the proposed cuts in the present N. Y. A. appropriations, which have proven to be entirely inadequate and have not even begun to touch the problem? Let us discuss and solve the youth unemployment problem, and you will not have to worry about communism or any other "ism."

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has asked me several questions. I am going to ask him one. Is he in favor of communism?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. No; I am opposed to communism or any other "ism." I am for capitalism, and I want to preserve American democracy, but you cannot preserve that democracy if you permit 4,700,000 young people to starve in the richest country in the world. You cannot preserve that democracy by evading the problem by means of raising a "red" scare.

Mr. CREAL. And you are not going to promote their interests by defending, commending, and alibiing for communism either. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. May I say to the gentleman that the question of communism has been raised solely for the purpose of putting up a smoke screen in order to conceal the real issue. I am telling you how to handle the issue of communism or any other "ism." The only way to handle it is to get jobs for our young people. That is the way you fight any kind of "ism" in this country.

Mr. CREAL. Can the gentleman say that he has any method in particular how to get Communists out of the Government and out of the youth organizations?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Pass the American Youth Act and I repeat you will have no occasion to worry about any "ism" among our young people.

Mr. CREAL. Does the gentleman think that will make good American citizens out of the Communists?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That will make Americans respect and want to live for America. The best guarantee for Americanism is to give Americans a real stake in the American democracy.

Mr. BOREN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CREAL. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. BOREN. I have listened with great attention to the gentleman's remarks and I think he is eminently correct. I might add as one Member of Congress, and I hope the gentleman will agree with me, if there is anybody in the United States who wants to live under a Communist government there is one in existence in this world and they are welcome to go over there.

Mr. CREAL. No legislative program good, bad, or indifferent will enhance its chance of becoming a law by admitting that part of its ranks are Communists, but such admission will do much to weaken it. It had better be an organization smaller in number and all with American ideals.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATRICK] 5 minutes.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to get up and speak on this, but I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] got up the other day in my unfortunate absence and made reference to me. I have a high regard for him. I have been looking for him to smile ever since he came to Congress, but I have yet to see him smile. I had hoped he would be here this afternoon so that we might prod him a little and possibly get him to smile.

In my absence the other day he got up in Congress and said that three of those who had been invited to the White House the other night were not accounted for, mentioning me as one of the three. I do not know what he meant by that. I do not know why we should have to account to the gentleman from Wisconsin. I was invited.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. I wonder if the distinguished gentleman from Alabama would permit me to have the gentleman from Wisconsin here? Does the gentleman feel he would like to have the gentleman from Wisconsin here? He is engaged in committee at the present time, but I could probably get him here.

Mr. PATRICK. Yes, please, get him over here. I would be glad to have him present. I only have 5 minutes, and the gentleman is taking that up.

Mr. DITTER. Shall I take the rest of it up, sir?

Mr. PATRICK. It probably would be better spent. I know the gentleman and I could both agree on that.

Mr. Chairman, I was invited. I got a very polite letter from Mrs. Roosevelt. I assume the others did too. I did not know what it was all about and I did not inquire. I knew it would be all right, or she would not invite us. So I gladly accepted the invitation. She said a few people would be there. There were three of this Youth Congress there, a boy and two girls, or rather a young man and two young ladies, sitting up front beside the First Lady.

I think they had some other things they wished to discuss which were never reached. There were in attendance some, incidentally, that the gentleman from Wisconsin did not happen to get tab on that are absolutely unaccounted for. He did not quite get his personnel right of those who were at the White House. I believe if he had been invited, he would have been there. I hope surely he would have.

The question came up at this White House meeting about this communistic matter. I raised it myself, I think; either I or Senator LEE, of Oklahoma, was the first to raise it. They stated that out of 61 organizations among the young people, 1 was acknowledged as Communist. So Senator LEE and Senator WHEELER, who was there, and I assailed that and stated that as long as there was one communistic organization——

Mr. HOFFMAN. A point of order. Well, I will state it in the form of a request. Is it a violation of the rules to talk about Members of the other body this way?

Mr. PATRICK. No; I think not. We will talk that way. [Laughter.]

So we were there and discussed that matter as to the communistic idea. Those who spoke thought the idea of a little communism in there would ruin their whole program. That matter took up the whole evening. We got there about 9 o'clock and left at nearly 11.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GROSS. Is it true that the Members who voted against the Dies committee were all there?

Mr. PATRICK. Some were and some where not. I do not know. I voted for the Dies committee.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MILLER. I was just wondering if the gentleman was there as a Member of the House or as a member of the Youth Congress.

Mr. PATRICK. As an invitee of the White House and nothing else. I am a Member of the House, and I could not keep from being a Member of the House, but I did not try to represent either. I do not belong to the Youth Congress.

Mr. MILLER. That is what I was getting at.

Mr. PATRICK. There were no Republicans there, if that is what is paining you in the stomach.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman leave his remarks in the RECORD just as he makes them?

Mr. PATRICK. Well, I will not consult the gentleman about whether I do or not.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I know; but would the gentleman just leave them in? I should like to see the gentleman leave them in as he makes them.

Mr. PATRICK. I am pretty careful about that. I might this time.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I noticed him taking them out. The gentleman is careful.

Mr. PATRICK. Well, once, I will admit; but I will probably leave them in just as they are made this afternoon. But if I see anything in there that I think ought not to be in, if I can, I will get it out. [Laughter.]

After the last day of the youths' conference was over I did have one interesting little conversation. Some of those young folks stayed down at the hotel where I live. This will let a little light in on how they overestimate their importance in this country. However, I do think they have something, if they could get the Communists out, that is worthy of our listening to. This is one little point they brought out that night.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be generous enough to yield 2 minutes so the gentleman may yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] in due order.

Mr. PATRICK. Yes; I would be glad to do that.

I think sometimes there is no danger of a Congressman overestimating the importance of his job, but there is danger of a Congressman overestimating his own importance. So when I hear a Congressman get up and take the others to task and give an account of their presence, and all that, I think he is taking the wrong attitude; too important. So I have intended not even to answer that, but since it is out we will go into it.

I do think this young group, however, overestimate their own importance; and this is an example: They were standing around there, as I started to say, at the hotel where I live, and I said, "Well, you young people had the President talk to you today." One of them said, "Yes; he talked to us, but," he said, "you know his talk did not go over so hot with us today."

That is what he said about the President of the United States you know. They all seemed to chime in. If there had been just one who said that I would not have thought anything about it but they all seemed to chime in. I do not know whether that was a part of its communistic group or not. They say only one out of the 61 organizations, a comparatively small part of their organization, is communistic.

Of course, I do not believe any true American has any sympathy or can compromise with the communistic program. I do not think they will get anywhere as long as there is a taint of communism in their organization. I do not believe either House of Congress, either the upper or lower branch—whichever you consider upper or lower; I have serious doubts about this House being the lower—will have any hesitation in refusing to go along with a program for the reason that they are behind it so long as they carry the taint of communism. But we do not want to let that feeling of anticommunism shadow our action and have the effect of disrupting an American program for putting over things that ought to be done, because somebody way across the hollow will be hollering communism. I think there is that danger. I do think there was one thing—regardless of all that, there is one cry that that group is making that is justified, and that is that business, taking up its slack in this Nation, has a tendency to take up the slack with those already employed and those that are older and is leaving a lot of young people out in the cold. I do think there ought to be some constructive legislation enacted that would, if possible, try to reach that threatening trouble.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATRICK. Yes; we took the courtesy to get the gentleman over here so that I might reply to him about anything he had to say.

Mr. KEEFE. I was not privileged to be here while the gentleman was making his remarks.

Mr. PATRICK. Oh, you missed it. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEEFE. Well, I shall have the privilege, perhaps, of reading it in the RECORD tomorrow.

Mr. PATRICK. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. And I want to say to the gentleman that I am prepared, and will at the proper time, answer not only the gentleman who is on the floor, but the other gentlemen who were kind enough to talk of and concerning me the other day in reference to this youth movement.

Mr. PATRICK. We do not doubt that.

Mr. KEEFE. And I shall be glad to give the gentleman an opportunity when I make that statement to be present. In view of the statement just made——

Mr. PATRICK. Oh, I am sure, the gentleman can do it, brother, believe me.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman not elaborate a little bit, instead of being quite so vague, and tell us just what he proposes in the shape of legislation to give these young people jobs, instead of just talking about it?

Mr. PATRICK. I have no bill; I have no program. So far as I know, I am the only man in Congress without some sort of a bill of this nature.

Mr. KEEFE. Has your party any bill or program?

Mr. PATRICK. Well, my party is a big bunch of folks. About 2 to 1 of the people in America now are Democrats.

Mr. KEEFE. But have you any program?

Mr. PATRICK. So it would be hard for me to announce my program, or anybody's program, for that big group of folks. You know I am just a little pebble on a big beach, and that beach is getting bigger and bigger every day.

Mr. KEEFE. You have suggested this Congress has an obligation to do something to give these people jobs.

Mr. PATRICK. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. We agree on that. Now, have you a suggestion, as one of the great representatives of the people here in Congress—have you a single, concrete suggestion of legislation that will give a single job?

Mr. PATRICK. No; I am simply one of the little ones in the Congress, and I am not saying, "Here is a program." I want to hear you wise boys do something about that, some of you boys with wisdom from up in the Middle West ought to shed some light on that. You have been qualifying to shed light on every other subject that has come up here.

Mr. KEEFE. At least, the gentleman will admit he has no program.

Mr. PATRICK. No program; no. The Democratic Party has a great program, but I am just here, that is all. [Laughter and applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. JENKS].

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, as a comparative novice insofar as national-defense questions are concerned, I hesitate to rise in opposition to an item in the bill under discussion which has been recommended by the Appropriations Committee, whose members are men of long and broad experience. However, this bill contains one item to which I am unalterably opposed—not only because of the expenditure it would eventually involve but because I believe there is a principle at stake. I refer to the item for the development of Guam. I believe that it is incumbent upon the Members of Congress to view any situation affecting our country in its entirety. We all know that the Navy Department is favorable to the fortification of Guam for defense purposes, but in view of the proximity of this island to the coast of Japan, I am wondering if the fortification of Guam would not be interpreted by Japan as an affront and might serve to make even more tense the atmosphere between the United States and the Island Empire. A situation is rarely so bad that it cannot be made worse, and in these times of stress and strain it seems to me that the fortification of Guam would be adding fuel to the fire.

On May 17, 1938, Congress directed the Secretary of the Navy to appoint a board to investigate and report upon the need, for purposes of national defense, of additional submarine, destroyer, mine, and naval air bases on the coasts of the United States, its Territories, and possessions. No less an authority than Rear Admiral Arthur J. Hepburn was chairman of the investigating board. On January 3, 1939, the Secretary of the Navy submitted the so-called Hepburn report to the House. Permit me to read one paragraph from that report:

> On December 18, 1919, the Joint Army and Navy Board recommended that "Guam be fortified and garrisoned adequate to its defense against any force that could be brought against it," and that a first-class naval base be prepared in Apra Harbor. The Washington Treaty of 1922 put an end to those plans, but that treaty has now expired.

Last year this House rightly and properly, in my opinion, rejected this proposal for the fortification of Guam. I believe it was then the consensus of opinion that this activity would at least appear like an unwarranted affront to Japan, but aside from that surmise it was largely conceded that it would be an unjustifiable expenditure because Guam is away and beyond our natural sphere of defense. But here we are again confronted with the same proposal, as carried in this naval appropriation bill under discussion, although, I dare say, no one would hardly contend that anything has happened in the interim to clear the atmosphere between this country of ours and Japan or to make the necessity for intelligently expanding our Navy less urgent.

My colleague on the Naval Affairs Committee the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] contends that it would be a wonderful thing to have an air base at Guam, where scouting planes could be on guard for the protection of the United States. I am sorry to disagree with him, but I frankly admit that it is somewhat beyond me to understand why we would want or need to have either Navy or Army planes scouting for purposes of protection some 5,000 miles away from the Pacific coast line of our country.

I am for a strong and thoroughly adequate national defense. In view of world conditions, I want to see our Navy efficiently built up and properly equipped so as to be able to defend the United States, and, if need be, this entire hemisphere; but I believe if we are to have a Navy capable of doing that we will have to concentrate our efforts on building such a Navy solely for defense purposes rather than unnecessarily and unwisely scattering our forces hither and yon over the face of the globe.

I hope this proposed expenditure for the development of Guam will be eliminated from this bill.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose, and Mr. RAYBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8348, the naval appropriation bill for 1941, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EQUALIZATION OF LETTER CARRIERS (H. DOC. NO. 635)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H. R. 2001, Seventy-sixth Congress, entitled "An act for equalization of letter carriers."

I withheld my approval of bill H. R. 4285, passed by the Seventy-fifth Congress, which contained a similar provision and set forth my reasons therefor in a memorandum dated June 25, 1938, reading in part as follows:

Under existing law the annual salary rates for village delivery carriers are fixed at $1,150 for grade 1, $1,250 for grade 2, and $1,350 for grade 3. This bill proposes to increase the salary rates of each grade by $75 per year, or to $1,225 for grade 1, $1,325 for grade 2, and $1,425 for grade 3. The bill also provides for the increase in the hourly pay of substitutes in said service from 50 to 55 cents. The salary rates for postal employees at post offices of the first-, second-, and third-classes were prescribed by the act approved February 28, 1925. Since that time the workweek was first reduced by law from 48 hours to 44 hours, and again further reduced to 40 hours, which in effect results in a decrease of 16⅔ percent in service actually rendered for the same rate of pay. Until the financial situation of the Government becomes greatly improved and until the postal receipts and expenditures are brought more nearly into balance, I cannot, as a matter of sound policy, look with favor upon any proposed legislation which would provide for an increase in the salary rates of postal employees. I do not consider that there are sufficient reasons in support of this proposal to increase the salaries of village delivery carriers to justify an exception to the above-stated policy.

The bill, H. R. 2001, proposes to increase the minimum salary rate of carriers in the village delivery service from $1,150 to $1,200 and the maximum rate from $1,350 to $1,440, and the hourly rate for substitutes in that service from 50 to 60 cents an hour. This bill has been referred to the Postmaster General who advises that under the authority contained in the bill, should it become law, he proposes to fix the pay grades at $1,200, $1,320, and $1,440, and that the additional annual cost of the bill would amount to about $178,820. This would represent an increase of more than 10 percent in the annual cost of village delivery service.

My objections and observations respecting H. R. 4285, Seventy-fifth Congress, have equal application to this bill, H. R. 2001. I regret that I feel obligated to take this stand with respect to this class of employees, but I do not think that I would be justified in approving legislation that would give preferential treatment to this single group of employees.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 13, 1940.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objections of the President will be spread at large in the Journal.

Mr. BURCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill and the President's message be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and ordered printed.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION AT GOVERNMENT EXPENSE OF CERTAIN AUTOMOBILES

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Secretary of State and the accompanying draft of proposed legislation designed to permit, where ocean transportation is necessary and subject to certain other limitations, the transportation at Government expense of personally owned automobiles by certain officers of the Foreign Service of the United States.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Again, our Father in heaven, in the onward march of time we are brought together for another day. O God, we pray for the needs of men. May we be planted in that divine vineyard in which Thou art the husbandman, where the fruitless branches are cut away and those that bear fruit are cleansed that they may bear more fruit; thus whatsoever we doeth shall prosper, and we shall rejoice that there is no waste energy, no contagious doubt, and no annoying weariness. O river of God, flow this way, that its crystal tides may enrich the soil of our souls, bearing fruit in every good work. O Lord of life and light, we humbly pray Thee to let the golden morning break over this troubled world. May all peoples soon see the vision that transfigures sorrow, lightens the darkness, and immortalizes hope. Flowing from our hearts is a prayer for our beloved Speaker. In the name and for His glory, our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 8237. An act to amend the District of Columbia Revenue Act of 1939.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 3069. An act to provide for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7922) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. GLASS, Mr. BYRNES, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. MCCARRAN, Mr. HALE, and Mr. TOWNSEND to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following letter from the Clerk of the House:

THE SPEAKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The certificate of election, in due form of law, of Hon. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN as a Representative-elect to the Seventy-sixth Congress, from the Fourteenth Congressional District of New York, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. William I. Sirovich, is on file in this office.

Very truly yours,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBER

Mr. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN presented himself at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

EMPLOYEES' COMPENSATION FUND, EMERGENCY RELIEF

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 456.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the paragraph of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1940, under the heading "Employees' compensation fund, emergency relief," is hereby amended by striking out the sum "$3,200,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the sum "$4,700,000."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand it, the amounts required to take care of and pay the compensation of W. P. A. employees who have been injured in line of duty has been exhausted, that funds available to meet these payments are gone.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. That is correct.

I may say that when we started making relief appropriations the sum of $25,000,000 was set aside and earmarked in the Treasury out of relief funds for the purpose of being administered by the Employees' Compensation Commission to pay claims of W. P. A. workers who were injured in line of duty, they being held under the law to be employees of the Government. From time to time Congress has authorized the use of a portion of this fund. During the current year we authorized the use of $3,200,000. Subsequent to the time of that authorization relief expenditures were increased. The fund, therefore, has run out. This resolution authorizes an additional $1,500,000 to be allocated from the fund heretofore set aside. It does not require the appropriation of any money, it is merely an authorization.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PAYMENT TO SAN CARLOS APACHE INDIANS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. ROGERS] calls up the bill H. R. 7551 and asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, there is opposition to the bills to be called up today, and I feel we should abide by the rules. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7551, with Mr. COOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, we have an hour of debate on each side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is entitled to recognition for 1 hour, and a member of the minority on the committee who may be opposed to the bill is entitled to recognition for 1 hour.

Permit the Chair to inquire, Is any minority member of the Committee on Indian Affairs opposed to the bill and seeking recognition? The Chair hears none. Is any member of the minority opposed to the bill and seeking recognition?

Mr. TABER. I am, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 1 hour in opposition to the bill, and the gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 1 hour in support of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for payment to the San Carlos Apache Indians for lands ceded by them. By an agreement in 1896 the San Carlos Indians ceded approximately 232,230 acres to the United States in trust for disposal under the mineral-land laws for the benefit of the tribe. Part of the land was disposed of under the general homestead laws and part taken by the United States, in violation of the agreement. The Indians have received only about $12,800 for the land and now claim that they should be paid at least $1.25 per acre, or a total of $290,400, less the $12,800 heretofore paid. The records of the Federal Government disclose that no claim settlement has been made with this tribe.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs has given you briefly the set-up as it appears. This bill provides for the payment of approximately $278,000 to the San Carlos Indians for a tract of land which they ceded in trust to the United States Government in 1896 for a certain purpose. In 1896 it was provided that this land should be open for mineral entry. It was thought there were considerable coal deposits on the land. However, it was found that not much coal could be developed there, so the Indians have received only a little over $12,000 in royalties for the coal which has been taken out of this tract. Meanwhile, since 1896, this land has been homesteaded and all the water holes have been patented, so that today white settlers have the valuable portions of this land in their possession.

This bill provides for the payment of a cash settlement to the San Carlos Indians and the return of the remainder of the land which has not been patented to the public domain, open to mineral entry and to use under the Taylor Grazing Act.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. How did the white settlers get possession of the land which they occupy?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I believe, if anyone is to blame, it was the fault of the Government in permitting them to take possession by homesteading. Now they have acquired title to the water holes in this tract, and I want to protect them in their homemaking.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Did they pay anything for it?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I presume they got it under the usual homestead provisions.

Mr. WOLCOTT. What right had the Government to give these white settlers permission under the homestead laws if this is an Indian reservation? They must have gotten it by purchase.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. They have patents now to certain tracts, and their rights must be protected, even if the Government had no legal right to permit those acquisitions.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The question is, Did they get it by purchase or are they there by squatter right or homestead right?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. They have their patents. I believe they are there by homestead right.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then they had to pay for the land, did they not?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Apparently they paid the usual fee which all homesteaders pay.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Where does this usual fee go that is paid for the land?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I presume it goes into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Instead of these Indians being paid for mineral rights, were they not paid this $12,800 for the land which the white settlers purchased and for which the settlers paid money into the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I do not so understand it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Has the gentleman read the letter of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I understand that the Indians received something over $12,000 as royalties on the coal that was removed from these lands.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here are Indians who have been deprived of something over 230,000 acres of land which was a part of their reservation until this very hour, and now the land is valueless to them, because all of the water holes have come into the possession of white settlers. I feel that if we do not pass this bill in substantially the same form in which it is today a grave injustice will be done to the San Carlos Indians, and also a grave injustice will be done to these white settlers. Many of the settlers have spent considerable money in developing their homes, and they also have a claim upon our consideration.

Let me picture the situation as it is. You know throughout the West in the mountain area—and this is mountain land, and very rough, fit only for grazing purposes—white settlers or cattlemen go into a new country, get possession of the water holes, preempt it, and finally patent it in blocks of 160 acres, or 320 acres, or 640 acres. This permits them to use a vast portion of the surrounding area, otherwise without water, for grazing purposes. This is the practice throughout all the West, so that 10 or 15 or 20 times the patented area is useful to these cattlemen, because they own the water holes and can use the surrounding territory as far as cattle can safely graze.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Not until I have completed my picture.

I believe you will agree with me that these cattlemen who have patented the water holes will maintain that to return any part of this strip to the Indians now—and the Indians do not want it returned to them now—would make the holdings of the white settlers valueless. These white holdings are valuable only so far as the settlers are able to make use of the surrounding lands for grazing. To return this land, other than the patented land, would mean that it would be worthless to the Indians. They cannot use it for grazing without the water holes. The Indian Bureau does not want this land returned to the Indians. The Indian Bureau prefers a cash settlement, and I have a statement here from the Commissioner himself.

Therefore you might say that justice requires the passage of this act with some sort of cash settlement. What amount of cash settlement? The bill provides for the equivalent of about $1.25 an acre.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you know that throughout our entire history public domain has been appraised at about $1.25 per acre. You may say that that is too much for some of this land, but I would call your attention to the fact that $1.25 an acre is too little for the land that has passed to private ownership. The Indians have been deprived of that, and you must take into consideration lands containing water as well as the mountain grazing land in considering $1.25 an acre as a fair price.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I will be very pleased to yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. At the time of the grants of land to the railroad companies throughout the United States, when the Government wrote a provision in those land grants to the effect that they could not be sold at less than $2.50 an acre, is it not a fact that Congress passed an act setting the same limitation upon the same kind of land you are talking about of $2.50 an acre?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. The gentleman is right. Although the price of Government land before the day of the railroads had been $1.25 per acre, it was raised to $2.50 per acre on Government lands checkerboarded with railroad lands in alternate sections, because it was assumed that when railroads built through the country they would increase the value of the half remaining in the public domain or double it in value. That was one very purpose of the legislation making railroad land grants.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the history of this bill? This bill, to my knowledge, has three times passed the Senate. This bill has been reported out favorably by the Indian Affairs Committee unanimously to my knowledge twice. This bill was before Congress before I became a Member. For 3 years my predecessor had been struggling to get this act of justice for the Indians passed. It has come up each time on the unanimous Consent Calendar. Each time it has been objected to, I think improperly and without a sufficient understanding of the implications of the whole thing.

Mr. COCHRAN and Mr. TABER rose.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman states this bill has been objected to on every occasion. Let me remind the gentleman that last August this bill passed the House, went to the President, and was vetoed by the President.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. COCHRAN. That was during the present Congress.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. The gentleman is correct. I was not quite through with my history of the bill. Since I have been a Member of the Congress the bill has been objected to——

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I will be very pleased to yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. A bill exactly like this was not vetoed, but the bill that was vetoed by the President was similar to this one.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. That is correct, too. This bill has been changed.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Arizona 5 additional minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Not just yet. This question should be answered. In my statement I said that the bill was objected to on the Consent Calendar and that has prevented the passage of the bill up to the present time, excepting that at the calling of the last Consent Calendar at the last regular session of Congress I went to the objector and I said, "What is your objection to this bill?" He said, "The amount of money is too great. If you will drop that to about $33,000, I shall remove my objection." Gentlemen will understand that right here in the Well of the House it is pretty difficult to come to any agreement of that sort. I said to the objector, "It is unfair and unjust to the Indians to pay them only $33,000 in a cash settlement for this land, but in order to get action on this bill, which has been so long delayed, I shall consent to decreasing the amount"; and we modified it, agreeing on the amount of about $33,000. I felt then and still feel that I did a wrong thing by the San Carlos Indians by that hasty agreement. I shall not do it again. The bill was passed. It went to the President. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] said, it was vetoed. That bill was vetoed. This bill is not the same thing. The bill before us has been modified. One of the President's objections in his veto was that an insufficient sum of money was paid to the Indians for 232,000 acres of land plus. We offered to pay them $33,000, approximately.

Another objection raised by the President was that the legislation seemed hasty and ill-considered in that it was not consistent in all of its parts. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] is responsible for that inconsistency. Right in the Well of this House I pointed out to him that you cannot change your arithmetic here in the Well of this legislative body. A certain sum of money was indicated. A certain number of acres at $1.25 an acre. You cannot legislate to multiply 24 by 10 and get a product of 15. That cannot be done, and that was the shape of the bill as we passed it at that time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. TABER. How does the gentleman explain this paragraph of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior:

> The failure of the Indians to receive substantial compensation from the ceded lands not included in reserves has been due, not to the breach of any obligation imposed upon the Government by the agreement, but to the absence of mineral in commercial quantities, the existence of which the Government did not, of course, guarantee.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. The Government was going to see that the Indians were to be paid a royalty on the coal. There was not much coal there, and they got only $12,000. Of course it was not the responsibility of the Government to put the coal there. No; but the Government ought to pay these Indians a fair price for this land even if no coal was found.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Is it not a fact that 10,000 acres of national forests were withdrawn from this tract, and would not $3 per acre be a ridiculous price to pay for timberland?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. The gentleman is exactly right. I feel these Indians ought to have fair treatment in this case, and paying these Indians $33,000 for that tract of land is not fair treatment. Let me disabuse your minds of what may be going through them now. This bill does not provide for putting $278,000 into the pockets of the San Carlos Indians. It provides that this money shall go into the Treasury of the United States, to be held in trust for these Indians, and to be appropriated as we appropriate other funds for Indians. I call attention to the fact that we are appropriating annually in the neighborhood of $200,000 as a gratuity to these Indians, so that it is not a matter of paying this on a pro rata basis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has again expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, in part the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK] is correct when he refers to my interest in this bill. I did say that the amount in the original bill was not in keeping with the recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget. It was from the report of the Bureau of the Budget that I secured the figures of $33,725. Probably a month or six weeks, if not more, passed between the time I first objected to this bill on the Consent Calendar and the time when the gentleman from Arizona agreed to the amendment. If the bill was hastily drawn, he certainly had plenty of time to draft the proper amendments within that time. Surely I was not obligated to perfect his bill. My opposition to this bill now is based on the veto message of the President. You are sending a bill containing certain language right back into the lap of the President which in his veto message he says he will not approve. I have the message before me. The President said, in part:

> While I would not favor legislation that would provide for the payment to the Indians of $1.25 per acre for this remaining acreage, I would favor its restoration to the Indians.

Now, while $1.25 is stricken out in this bill, still the amount involved is based upon $1.25 an acre. Probably the President also knows something about arithmetic. When he starts to figure out this amount represents $1.25 an acre, he is going to keep his word when he says he does not favor paying $1.25 an acre for this land and veto this bill if it ever gets to him.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield to the author of the bill.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. The bill we passed did not provide for the payment of $278,000. It provided for only $33,000. That is $1.25 an acre for that which has gone into private ownership. I am not surprised that the President vetoed such a gross injustice to the Indians.

Mr. COCHRAN. Now that may be true, due to the fact that the amount was reduced to $33,725, but nevertheless it was based upon $1.25 an acre, and so is this bill, and the President said in his veto message he—

> Would not favor legislation that would provide for the payment to the Indians of $1.25 per acre for this remaining acreage, but would favor its restoration to the Indians.

The President further said in his message. I quote:

> The provision of the pending bill for opening this land to public entry and thus depriving the Indians of the future use of the land and even their present receipts for such lands, appears to me definitely objectionable.

That is the President's language—not mine.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. The President said he would object to paying $1.25 an acre for the remaining lands. Now, if you take all the water holes out of that area—and they are taken out now—I do not blame the President for objecting to paying $1.25 an acre for the remaining lands, but this bill provides at the rate of $1.25 an acre for all of it, including the water lands. This is not too much.

Mr. COCHRAN. Now, if the gentleman will take the water out of the bill and reduce the amount to $33,000 and strike out section 2, I will vote for the bill.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. Not just now.

We did not have an opportunity to see this revised bill until this morning. This bill was not reported to the House until yesterday. You have another bill that you intend to call up today—a big bill—involving plenty of money, that was only reported to the House last night. We did not have an opportunity to see that report until a few minutes ago. We have had no time to read it up to this moment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. In just a minute.

While the language in this bill is somewhat different from the measure vetoed, it is certainly similar, as the gentleman from Arizona stated. Its objective is to reach the same purpose as the bill that the President vetoed with about $220,000 added. Now, why send it back to the President? Why take up the time of the House today considering a bill which the President, in his veto message, said he would not approve of?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does not the gentleman feel that the President of the United States, the same as the gentleman and myself, has a right to change his mind? How do we know that the President is going to veto a bill because he vetoed a similar bill sometime in the past? He may in the meantime have gotten additional information.

Mr. COCHRAN. Is the gentleman from Montana able to speak for the President of the United States and say that if this bill is passed in its present form the President of the United States has advised him he will sign it?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Absolutely not. I have no right to speak for the President of the United States, but I do say he has got a right to change his mind.

Mr. COCHRAN. In the absence of such assurance, let us feel that the President of the United States is going to stand on his objections to the original bill. This so-called similar bill contains those same objections.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Does the gentleman take issue with the statement of the Secretary of the Interior when he says, "The fact remains, however, that the consideration so far received by the Indians, a little more than $12,000 spread over a period of nearly 40 years, is grossly inadequate for the surrender of their rights in more than 230,000 acres of land"?

Remember, in that land there were 10,000 acres of forest land which the Indians had a right to receive the benefit of.

Mr. COCHRAN. All right, but the gentleman should not make a speech in my time. I yielded for a question.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. That land contains 10,000 acres of forest land to which the Indians were entitled. Do you want to deprive them of that?

Mr. COCHRAN. If the Indians did not receive a sufficient amount, let us go back and give them the $33,000 which the Bureau of the Budget says is all right. I am willing to go along with that, provided you strike out section 2, which relieves the other objection of the President.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. COCHRAN. I refuse to yield further. The gentleman can get some time. The chairman of the committee has 1 hour.

When the time arrives, if I get an opportunity, I am going to move to strike out $277,966.37 and put back in $33,725; and if that carries, I will also move to strike out section 2. If the bill goes to the President in that form, his objections will be removed, and, in my opinion, he will then sign the bill.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. Do I understand the gentleman is basing his protest against this bill on the assumption that the President would veto it in its present form?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes. The President stated in his veto message why he vetoed it. The objectionable features that were in the original bill remain in this bill until you remove the figure $1.25 per acre. Your total is based upon $1.25 per acre, and the President stated that he would not favor $1.25 per acre for the remaining land. He also wants the land returned to the Indians.

Mr. MUNDT. Does not the gentleman believe in view of the frequency with which the President has changed his mind on other points that he should be permitted to change his mind on this?

Mr. COCHRAN. I can say to the gentleman from South Dakota that I am not in a position to speak for the President on this matter. My views are based on his veto message.

Mr. MUNDT. Then let us give him a chance to reconsider the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, to my way of thinking it is farfetched, indeed, for a legislative body such as this House to refuse to legislate upon a matter exclusively within its jurisdiction upon the theory that the Executive is going to nullify the act of Congress. This is the legislative branch of this Government. If the President of the United States does not like what we do here, does not like the sort of legislation we pass here, he has the right and the prerogative of vetoing it. But that is up to him. That is his responsibility, and should not, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, deter Members of Congress from exercising their congressional rights and performing their legislative functions.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I agree with the gentleman. Certainly we can pass a bill over the President's veto if it is necessary.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Exactly so.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. However, I am glad the President vetoed the other bill. The point I wanted to make with regard to this bill is that two of the objections mentioned by the President concerning the other bill have been removed. The bill he vetoed contained a mathematical inconsistency. This bill has ironed that out. The President did say that he was not in favor of paying the Indians $1.25 per acre for the remaining acres; but this bill does not do that. This bill provides for the payment of $1.25 an acre for the entire tract, which is fair.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

The liberality of the gentleman from Missouri is on a par with the decisions of the Court of Claims. There have been presented to the Court of Claims in 192 cases claims involving $2,187,000,000 on behalf of the Indians of this country for determination. What has happened? Thirty million dollars has been recovered in those 192 cases, 1½ percent; and when the gentleman from Missouri says today that he is willing to concede $30,000 he is acting on a par with the decisions of the Court of Claims. That is the kind of treatment an involuntarily subjected people in this country, namely, the Indians, have gotten before this Court of Claims; that is to say, that when they go before that court with their claims, regardless, they come out with an average of the sum of 1½ percent of the amount of the claims they presented to the court. Let us see, Mr. Chairman, whether or not we should give these Indians a square deal.

I cannot forget the words of the immortal Will Rogers, whom we all loved, from the State of Oklahoma. They are still ringing in my ears. He was asked at one time in his life, "Did your ancestors come over in the Mayflower?" He replied, "No, my ancestors met the Mayflower."

The Indians were here before the white men. What was the first act of Congress dealing with these Indians? Remember, the Revolutionary War was closed between this country and England in 1783. Congress, in 1787, in one of the first acts concerning the Indians, laid down a policy. Why? Because the Indians were here; they were in possession of this country, and we attained sovereignty over this group at the time of the making of the peace treaty between this country and Great Britain. This policy was written into the laws of this country, and it has never been repealed:

> The utmost good faith shall always be observed toward the Indians. Their lands and property shall never be taken from them without their consent, and in their property rights and liberty they never shall be invaded or disturbed unless in just and lawful wars authorized by Congress; but laws founded in justice and humanity shall from time to time be made for perfecting wrongs being done to them and for preserving peace and friendship with them.

Have we treated these Indians squarely? Remember, Mr. Chairman, they were an unlettered and ignorant race of people. What have we done? How did we acquire the territory of the State of Pennsylvania? It was bought from the Indian tribes with a lot of trash—stockings, shirts, bolts, nuts, rags—and, yes, they went a little further; they gave them two or three auchess of beer, two or three auchess of cider, if you please, and of rum, I may say to the distinguished gentleman from New York. The whites just stole the Indians' lands from them for little or nothing, and then poisoned them with alcoholic drink as well. That is a matter of history. Right in my own State, when they were trying to get the Crow lands away from the Indians, they did the same thing, as is shown by the following statement. An Indian was appealing to the authorities and the powers that be to give them justice. What did he say? Here are his words:

> The treaty (of 1868), you say, has bought all our land except on the side of the river. And what do we get for it? We get a pair of stockings, and when we put them on they go to pieces. They get some old shirts and have them washed, and give them to us; we put them on and our elbows go right through them. They send us tin kettles; we go to get water to carry to our lodges; we dip the water up, but it all runs out again.

That is the kind of situation we have. That is the way we took the Indians' property away from them, and that is how we paid for it, and this is a sample of our brand of justice to the Indians.

Mr. Chairman, in 1870 the Indian population of this country was about 250,000. I have a chart in my hand here. The black line shows the tribal-owned land in 1871. I want you gentlemen who claim to be the watchdogs and guardians of the Treasury to look at this for a moment. Do you see where that black line reaches in 1871? Do you see it dropping down gradually? Now, the Indian population has increased, but the land holdings have decreased.

There were 100,000 Indians in this country who were homeless, landless, and going any place they could to get some place to live. What has happened? We have the Indian population increasing. Look at that line—1887, 1900, 1911, 1933, and 1938—gradual raiding of the Indians' property. You will notice there is a little up in the black streak there in 1938. Do you know how that came about? Congress, tired of the robbery of the Indians, wrote into the laws of this country the Reorganization Act, which, among other things, created a revolving fund to buy land for homeless, landless, roaming Indians so that they could live.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman think that any of the things he has been talking about is any reason why we should authorize a payment to Indians who are not entitled to it under their contract?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I may say in answering the gentleman: Perhaps he is technically correct, and I may be dealing with collateral matters. The bill has been very well explained by its author, but these are matters I want the Members of Congress to hear. I want the country to know. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I happen to be a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which held extensive hearings on the pending bill. Following these hearings, the bill was unanimously reported by the members of the committee, after a thorough consideration. Insofar as prohibiting indefensible raids on our Federal Treasury is concerned, I believe that I can put my record up against any spokesman for economy on the floor of the House—even that of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN]. Like the gentleman, I have no Indians in my district. I will qualify that. Perhaps I have half a dozen Indians in my district. However, I approach this legislation on its merits. I am glad that in the committee there was no division along political party lines. The consideration was free from politics, and I therefore hope the Republican and Democratic Members of the House will carry on this nonpartisan attitude when we consider the bill today.

I am a new member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, although I have served in Congress for 11 years. I find during my brief service on the Indian Affairs Committee that the record of the Government of the United States with reference to its treatment of the real original Americans is nothing to boast about.

There are Members of this House who advocate that Uncle Sam play Santa Claus in a big way to foreign nations and foreign people in the name of humanity. They advocate the pouring out of hundreds of millions of dollars from the Treasury of the United States to foreign countries in the name of taking care of the poor people whose land has been invaded. The record of the United States insofar as our Indian brethren are concerned indicates it is just as bad as the invasion of Belgium, just as bad as the invasion of Poland and the invasion of Finland. The American Indians are the real 100-percent Americans, and the record shows the United States Government drove the Indians from their homes, took possession of their property, killed them, debauched their squaws, and put the survivors in concentration camps, which we call for politeness' sake Indian reservations.

The only criticism I have about this bill is that it does not go far enough. If we pass it, I believe the President will sign the bill, and it will not take one dollar out of the Treasury. It will not put one dollar into a single Indian's pocket. It merely assigns the money justly due to the Indians, and I intend to show you it is due the Indians, in a few minutes. It will be placed to the credit of the Indians, a mere bookkeeping arrangement, and before the Indians may receive one dollar of the money or receive one dollar of benefits, action will have to be taken by a future Congress.

Now let us look at the facts. Perhaps some of you have not had an opportunity to carefully consider the committee report, which contains a great deal of the information which was brought to the attention of the Committee on Indian Affairs—information, facts, and evidence upon which your committee, after holding extensive hearings, voted unanimously to favorably report this bill to the House. The testimony and the Interior Department report show the Indians ceded this land to the United States, but ceded it for mineral exploitation only. The admission of the Department, contained in the Assistant Secretary of the Interior's letter appearing on page 3, clearly indicates that the law has been violated and, although the Indians ceded this land to the United States for mineral exploitation only, the Government of the United States literally hijacked and stole the most valuable portions of the land belonging to these Indians.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 additional minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The report from the Secretary of the Interior clearly indicates that in addition to selling the water holes, which are the heart of this reservation—you take away the water holes and you make the other part of the reservation practically useless and worthless—there have been other violations of the law by the United States Government. Much of the valuable land has been taken for school land-grant purposes, for water-reserve sites, for power dams, and for homestead entry, as well as turned into the national forest. The report of the Secretary of the Interior admits that the only authority Uncle Sam had with reference to these Indian lands under his contract with the Indians—a solemn, binding contract—was to exploit and make use of the mineral rights.

This report states:

> The records of the General Land Office indicate that some of the lands in the ceded area have been included in homesteads; that various tracts have been selected by the State of Arizona as school-land grant, lieu, or indemnity selections; that there have been a number of withdrawals for power sites and public water reserves; and that approximately 10,500 acres have been included in a national forest. The Indians have received no payment whatever for any of these lands. An examination of the provisions of the agreement with the Indians and of the ratifying act, quoted above, indicates that the cession by the Indians in the agreement of 1896 was to the United States, not absolutely but in trust. The trust was to be executed by disposing of the ceded lands in a stated manner, under the mineral-land laws only, and the Indians were to receive, the proceeds accruing therefrom. All of the lands were subject to that stated purpose. Neither the agreement nor the ratifying act contains any provision, express or implied, authorizing disposal of the lands in any other manner, or for purposes which would net no return to the Indians. The plain language used precludes any other interpretation. It follows that the disposal of a portion of the lands under the general homestead laws and the withdrawal of other lands from entry and sale for national forest, power sites, and water reserves was authorized and in violation of the agreement and the statute. Likewise the selections made by the State of Arizona under its school-land grant were improperly allowed.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] says that he is in favor of righting this wrong by paying $1.25 an acre for only the water holes and the other valuable lands which Uncle Sam has illegally taken from his Indian wards. If the gentleman from Missouri had a farm with a homestead and 100 acres of land, and the entire farm was worth $12,500, would he feel that justice would be done if Uncle Sam would take the value of the farm, divide it by the number of acres, then take 2 acres, with the house and other buildings, and pay the gentleman $125 an acre for it? That is just what the gentleman proposes to do under his amendment.

I sincerely hope that this Congress will right this wrong and will take care of these poor, defenseless Indians, the original American citizens, who have been shamefully treated by the Government of the United States. Remember that charity begins at home. Particularly to those who advocate hand-outs of hundreds of millions of dollars to people in foreign lands, I say, take care of our American Indian wards first.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman says this is merely an authorization bill, which it is. If it becomes law and an appropriation is made, the gentleman says, not a dollar of it will be taken out of the Treasury. The gentleman knows as well as I know that if that procedure is followed, that is, the authorization is passed and the money is appropriated, then a bill will be brought in immediately to pay that money per capita to the Indians.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman does not know any such thing.

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes, he does. Experience shows it.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In fact, I know the gentleman from Missouri took the directly opposite position when the authorization for the expenditure of about $5,000,000 to erect a Jefferson Memorial in the gentleman's own State and district came before the Congress.

Mr. COCHRAN. There never was a cent authorized by Congress for that memorial. I may say to the gentleman I did take the opposite position. I took a position at the time the resolution was passed creating the Commission I would not ask for an appropriation. All I wanted was the Commission. If the gentleman will look at the RECORD, he will find that is so. I always keep promises I make to this House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I may say to the gentleman from Missouri that I have the highest regard and affection for him. Before I left Congress, riding out on the New Deal tidal wave in 1932, I served as a member of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, of which he is now the chairman. I took a place on that committee at the request of Martin Madden, who explained to me that a great deal of saving could be brought about in the operations of the Government by an effective committee, such as the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, which had just been created. I believe the gentleman would be furthering the interest of economy and furthering the interest of our Federal Treasury if he would follow the unanimous report of the Republican and Democratic members of the Committee on Indian Affairs and not waste his time opposing a bill which is as fair and just as this pending measure. He should devote the time and energy he is wasting on this bill to perform the duties which the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments is charged with.

I frankly state that if the gentleman would investigate some of the unwarranted, unauthorized, and illegal expenditures that have been made he would be doing a fine thing, and he would save billions of dollars instead of the few thousands which he is trying to keep out of the pockets of the poor Indians who have been exploited by Uncle Sam.

Mr. COCHRAN. I may say to the gentleman that my opposition to the Indian bills results from a hearing held by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, where it was brought out that there were then pending in the Court of Claims Indian suits against the Government in the amount of $3,000,000,000 filed by attorneys for the Indians of all tribes throughout the country. As a result, I have been opposing these bills, which I believe are unjust to the taxpayers of the country. We heard the testimony of the Comptroller General and the Attorney General while the Appropriations Committee heard judges of the Court of Claims.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman will admit, however, that most of these suits are to determine the equities of the claims, and only an infinitesimal portion of the claims are allowed. I sincerely hope the gentleman will not oppose this bill on those grounds because his position would not be tenable. If someone would divest the gentleman of his property and drive him off it, and breach a contract with him, and exploit and rob him, he would certainly want to have an opportunity to go into the courts or before the Congress to protect his legal rights, rights which every American citizen, including our Indians, have under our American constitutional system of government, which, thank God, still remains in this troubled and distressed world. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have everybody in here just throw away his prejudices for about 3 or 4 minutes, forget he is a Republican or a Democrat or whether he is opposed to legislation or not, and let us find out what there is to this bill. I have always been opposed, as you know, to any rule of Congress by which one man may prevent legislation, but I am not responsible for the making of that rule, and every day in Congress with me is a day in Congress, and when that page is closed I hold no resentment; I look forward to another day.

Now, in this particular case the facts are substantially as follows:

In 1896 these Indians owned all this land—230,000 acres in Arizona—and if you know anything about the West you know about what kind of land that is. In the great arid West there is no land worth anything unless it is attached to some kind of water. The Indians ceded this land, or agreed to cede this land, to the Government so that it might sell it for mineral purposes, and the Indians were to receive the money. They did not agree to hand this land over for homesteads, they did not agree to hand this land over for forest reserves, but for the purpose of selling it for them. This land was turned over in trust to the Government and it turned out there was not very much coal land of value. There is a dispute here whether the Indians got this money as royalty or for the land, but it does not make a bit of difference, because they both agree on the amount received. The amount they received for these three quarter sections of land for coal purposes was a net of $12,000. Now, see what happened right at that time, too. The Government opened up this land that they had no right to open up for homestead settlements.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. When this land was ceded did that act specifically provide that this should apply only to mineral rights?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes; I can read the stipulation right here, the gentleman will find it on page 6, that "the net proceeds accruing from the disposal of such coal and mineral lands lying within the ceded territory," and it applied to mineral lands only.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. If the gentleman will permit a further question, how does it happen that the Federal Government did cede or grant patents?

Mr. BURDICK. How does it happen that the Federal Government took all of the land in North Dakota that belonged to the Indians and never paid them a dime for it? The same process has been going on for 150 years.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Inasmuch as the Government, then, had no right to do this, does the land actually belong to these squatters or these settlers?

Mr. BURDICK. Whenever the Government opens up a piece of land for homestead entry and the entrymen comply with the law and get the patents, they have a title to it, and the only recompense you can give these Indians is to pay them for the land.

Now, in opening up this land, remember that the ranchers took the water holes first, of course. If you do not have water on the range, you have not anything. They went around this reservation and patented these particular places, and the other land is left there.

Now, I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] that the rest of this land is not worth $1.25 an acre. Of course it is not; but when you consider the fact that the Government permitted homesteaders to go in and take the best of it, which was worth maybe $50 an acre, then it is not too much of a stretch of the imagination to say that the entire tract before the best lands were taken was worth $1.25 an acre.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. And is it not a fact that some of these water-power and dam sites, which the Government illegally took possession of, are worth far more than $100 an acre or $200 an acre or $500 an acre?

Mr. BURDICK. That is right.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Is it not a fact that more than 10,000 acres of this tract is set aside as a national forest now?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. And is certainly worth more than $1.25 an acre?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes. The Government took absolute possession of this land and farmed it out to anybody that wanted it as forest reserves, power sites, homesteads, or school land. The State of Arizona went in and selected portions of this land. Look at the report of the Secretary of the Interior and the report of the Comptroller of the Currency. They all admit that the Indians never got a dime for this land.

Now, here is the only question before this Congress. We are asking that you pay the Indians $1.25 an acre for all of the land, the land that has been taken by the homesteaders, the valuable part of it, the land selected for power sites, the land taken for school purposes of Arizona, and the land taken for forest reserves, pay them $1.25 an acre for all the land you took away from them because you mishandled it. There is not a man who can stand up in this Congress and say the Government did not mishandle this property, because the Indians gave them this land for one particular purpose and the Government used it for different purposes.

Here is a case where one man cannot stop this legislation. You never should have a rule like that, anyway—to let one man say that we cannot pass this bill, but here all of us can pass upon it. You can all say, is it just to pay these Indians this money, or to say that we will turn them away with $33,000?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Can the gentleman cite to the House any rule of the House that allows any one man to prevent the passage of a bill?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes, I can. The gentleman knows it just as well as I do. What is the use of asking me that question? He knows it better than I do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think the gentleman is misinterpreting the rule with respect to the passage of bills under the Consent Calendar. There is no rule which provides that any one man can stop the passage of a bill, excepting on the Consent Calendar, and the Consent Calendar is for the purpose of expediting legislation. It does not deprive any Member of the House from proceeding in any other manner by which legislation can be passed to have his bill considered.

Mr. BURDICK. How long has the gentleman been a Member of this House?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Ten years.

Mr. BURDICK. I have been a Member of the House for 6 years, and since I have been in Congress has the gentleman ever heard of a rule being brought in for the consideration of an Indian bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not know of any rule that prohibits the consideration of an Indian bill.

Mr. BURDICK. Does the gentleman know of any rule ever being brought in for the consideration of an Indian bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not know of any rule which prohibits the Indian committee from calling up a bill and having it considered, and we are doing that very thing today.

Mr. BURDICK. Oh, I cannot deal in generalities. I deal with what happens here every day. I have been here, as I say, for 6 years, and I never saw a rule brought in for the consideration of an Indian bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Has the gentleman ever heard of an Indian bill being called up under suspension of the rules?

Mr. BURDICK. No; I never have.

Mr. WOLCOTT. In what way are the Indian bills called up?

Mr. BURDICK. Most of the bills I have seen here called up have been called up under the Consent Calendar.

Mr. WOLCOTT. They are called up under a rule.

Mr. BURDICK. And whenever the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] did not object, the gentleman from Michigan did.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, I have objected to Indian bills, I admit.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I have been a Member of Congress for 3 years. This bill has been before this House at several different times, and today is the first time this bill has ever been on call on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. BURDICK. You gentlemen here are responsible for what you do. I do not know what you want to do. I do not know what your people want you to do, but I assume that there is not a man here who does not want to be just. Take the facts in this case as they are—how the Government has reached out and taken all this land and never paid the Indians anything—and then you decide just the way you would want somebody to decide for you and just forget your party. I can talk to you, because I am the only member of a nonpartisan party in this Congress speaking at this time.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman can also talk to us because he can talk the Indian language. Did the gentleman hear my remarks on this bill?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Did the gentleman hear my statement that there is another man who has to pass on this, the President?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. And he has already passed upon it.

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. And he vetoed a similar bill last August, so why waste all this time and throw it back in his lap?

Mr. BURDICK. The one thing that I can say about the President is that he did veto a similar bill to this bill, and that he vetoed the bill on a statement prepared in the Accounting Office, not in the Department of the Interior.

Mr. COCHRAN. The Bureau of the Budget and the Attorney General prepare such statements.

Mr. BURDICK. The President never knew when he vetoed the bill that the Government had gone in and taken possession of this best land.

Mr. COCHRAN. According to the veto message, he knew something about it, because he did say in his veto message that he would be willing to put the land back into the hands of the Indians.

Mr. BURDICK. That is not our job. Our job is to legislate, and if the President sees fit to veto the legislation, that is his business. It is not our job to legislate on the theory that he will veto or approve a bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, being a member of the Indian Affairs Committee, I am very anxious to know the facts about this bill. I just talked to the Indian department, and I learn that this land was ceded to the United States Government by the Indians only as to mineral rights, and that the United States Government did, in violation of its own agreement, cede the water holes to the whites, or other individuals.

So that those individuals received title to them. Those titles now are valid, so I am informed by the department. They cannot be changed. Nevertheless, without the remaining portion of this land it is impossible for the people who have these water holes to do anything with them. It is impossible to do anything with the remaining land without them. The fact is that these Indians had their land taken from them by the Government without the right of the Government to take that land away. We cannot get away from that fact. Under those conditions and circumstances, I believe the Indians are entitled to compensation. I am not saying what that compensation ought to be. I do not know. But I do make the point that the Indians in this particular instance should be compensated for having land taken away from them, having it given to someone else by the Government, which had no right to do that. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, personally I have too much confidence in the membership to believe that if every Member of this body understood the facts in this bill there would be made some of the statements that have been made today, or that the Members would hold the attitude some have expressed toward Indian bills in general.

I just happened to be talking with a Member, who is of the opinion that the General Accounting Office holds the Indians have been paid for the land that has been taken, as well as the mineral land that has been sold. That is not correct. You will find in the report a letter from the Comptroller General giving the record of the General Accounting Office. It does show that the Indians received a net of $12,433 for four tracts of land containing 160 acres each. The total amount from the sale was $12,800, but deducting the expenses of the survey it left a net of $12,433. But to say that that means that the Indians have been compensated for all the land that the United States has actually taken or appropriated entirely overlooks the plain record that is given in the letter from the Department of the Interior on page 3 of the report. Payment for 640 acres, but more than 31,000 acres have been appropriated to other uses or given to other owners. I want to call your attention to the language there:

> The records of the General Land Office indicate that some of the lands in the ceded area have been included in homesteads.

Now, what is a homestead? That means land that has been homesteaded under the general jurisdiction of the Land Office. That land is gone. They are not going to be paid for that land unless you pay for it here. I read further:

> That various tracts have been selected by the State of Arizona as school-land grant in lieu of indemnity selections.

What is that? It means that some of the Indians' land has been used to supply the guaranty under the organic act of the State that so much land would be given the State for endowment of its school funds; that the State of Arizona selected some of that land within the boundaries of this reservation. It means that the United States Government, to whom this land was committed in trust for the benefit of the Indians, has permitted the State of Arizona to take some of the Indians' land for its school endowments. There is no record anywhere that there has been any compensation whatsoever for that land.

Further:

> That there have been a number of withdrawals for power sites and public water reserves.

Nowhere in the letter from the General Accounting Office is there any contention that this power site and public-water reserve land has been compensated for in any manner whatsoever.

Then further the report states:

> That approximately 10,500 acres have been included in a national forest.

That means that 10,500 acres of this land which was placed in the hands of the United States Government to hold in trust for the Indians has been appropriated by the guardian to be put into a national forest. Those 10,500 acres are today a part of the national forest, and there is no record anywhere in any part of this report or in the letter from the General Accounting Office that those 10,500 acres have been paid for in any degree or manner whatsoever.

Further in the report you will find this summarizing statement of the amount of land disposed of without compensation:

> Information compiled from the records of the General Land Office several years ago indicates that approximately 31,951.58 acres of land within the ceded area of the reservation have been disposed of.

So that out of 230,000 acres or more of land, 31,951 acres of land have been disposed of. The only record that the General Accounting Office shows of any payment at all is for the four tracts of land containing 160 acres each, for which they received this $12,433. So that over 31,000 acres of land, the choice land, has been wholly unpaid for, even though appropriated and put beyond recovery.

The purpose of this bill is to provide payment for the entire area on the basis that the choice tracts have been taken out and appropriated to the use of the Government, or given to the State of Arizona.

Certainly the Indians are entitled to payment for the land that has been used, sold, or given to the State in payment of a Federal obligation. No one can contend that that land, some of which is worth $25 or more an acre should be paid for at $1.25 an acre; either it should be paid for at a proper price and the remaining land returned or an over-all average price paid, as the bill proposes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. The gentleman has made a strong case showing that this land which has passed into private ownership is valuable land, far in excess of $1.25 an acre. To bolster that a little further, I want to call attention to the fact that the constitution of the State of Arizona requires that all public-school lands be valued at not less than $3 an acre. This school land was chosen as "lien land" and must have been considered as worth more than the average.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. This land that the State of Arizona has selected must be worth at least $3 an acre. When you speak of constitutions, the Indians read the Constitution of the United States. Some of the best expositions I have heard of the Constitution of the United States have been in an Indian council meeting out on the prairie or in an Indian tent. I have heard some of these Indians quote parts of the Constitution that many of us have forgotten. They recall that in the Constitution and in the Bill of Rights and in the amendments to the Constitution there are guarantees that a citizen of the United States shall not be deprived of his property without due process of law, although that has happened repeatedly in the history of the Government's dealings with the Indian lands of this country. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MUNDT. Yes; I shall be happy to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. JOHNS. I was interested in what the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] had to say about the Indians' knowledge of the Constitution, and also what the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK] had to say about the Constitution, and the rights of these Indians thereunder. I am wondering under this trust here whether the Government has any title to this land to convey to anybody. Can the gentleman answer that?

Mr. MUNDT. I imagine they took it in the first place the same as the whites took the States of Wisconsin, New York, and Ohio from the Indians, and that is by virtue of having better rifles and better guns. The white man has taken most of the lands from the Indians, the gentleman knows as well as I, by force of arms.

Mr. JOHNS. The point I am trying to get at—I do not know whether the gentleman understood me or not—is whether there is any title in a trustee to convey to anybody.
